THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE:

CONTAINING

THE DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS

OF THE U.S.

THIRD SESSION FORTIETH CONGRESS;

TOGETHER WITH

AN APPENDIX,

COMPRISING THE LAWS PASSED AT THAT SESSION.

BY F. & J. RIVES & GEORGE A. BAILEY.

CITY OF WASHINGTON:
OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.
1869.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1869, by F. & J. RIVES & GEO. A. BAILEY,

accept the best. It has been considered with a great deal of care and amended and reamended, and I believe now, under the advice of the board that was sitting here, the bill is as near perfect as it can be. We have avoided putting anything in the bill that the law provides now for the safety of passengers.

Mr. MORTON. I have just one word to say. Before Congress shall require every vessel that goes to sea, large or small, steam vessel or sailing vessel, to be provided with this patent apparatus, the price of which may be fixed by the patentee, while it may be an excellent thing for him, the Senate should not make a requirement of that kind upon all ship-owners without being well satisfied in the first place that these patents are valuable.

Mr. CORBETT. I think the Senator is mistaken in supposing that it confines it to any particular patent. It requires them to carry a life-boat, and only in two cases does it particularize as to any particular kind of life-boat, and that is that they carry large numbers, eight and ten life-boats. We require them to carry one self-bailing or self-relieving boat, which is said to be a very desirable boat; but if that is objectionable I will strike it out. I will agree to an amendment to strike that out if it is thought desirable.

Mr. NYE. I hope it will not be stricken out.

Mr. CORBETT. I inquired of the inspectors while they were here, and they said they could not recommend this. We required in the former bill a larger number of these self-bailing, self-relieving life-boats, and they advised me not to require so many of them. It might be modified in this way: "one of which may be self-bailing or self-relieving," if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. NYE. I hope that will not be done. This is a question in which there are more people directly interested than in any ordinary question that engages the attention of the Senate. We have become a traveling people. I have traveled by sea ten thousand miles a year for almost eight years in succession. It is a fact palpable to every one that the ship-owners will not put the means upon their ships for the preservation of human life unless they are obliged by law to do it. There is no question about it, they will not, as the Senator from Indiana says, tax themselves, and they cry out "patent rights," like the honorable Senator, when the lives of countless thousands depend upon this apparatus being on board the ships.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I am as much in favor as the Senator is of making all the preparation that can be to preserve human life. The simple question I made was whether, before we require all ships, great and small, of all kinds, to adopt these things, the Senate ought not to be satisfied that they are in themselves excellent.

Mr. NYE. That is what I am going to try to satisfy the Senate of, so far as the amendment I propose goes. I assert again that it is a fact patent that these ship-owners will not provide the means for the protection of life in case of accident at sea unless they are obliged by law to do it. Take Francis's life-boat, and every life-boat that has been made since the time the first one was patented; it was not got up by the ship-owners, but the law compelled them to buy it, and never till they were compelled to do it did one of them buy it; and they would not now if they could avoid it. That patent life-boat is good for the purposes it is intended for; in case you can lower the boat and get the passengers into it in time to save their lives, it is very well; but I repeat that the first signal of danger is the dangerous moment attending a shipwreck, and then it is that you want this light apparatus by which each person can take care of himself and protect the life of himself and others with him with a little coolness. In such a moment, taking one of these cork mattresses, that no matter which side is up is always tant and which every way it strikes is buoyant, it will hold up twelve persons till the life-boats can be launched, and these men can be rescued from a watery grave before it is too late.

Especially does this apply to the rivers. I call the attention of the honorable Senator again to the appalling accident which recently occurred on the Ohio river, where within fifteen feet of the shore men and women were burnt to a crisp and lost by hundreds. I ask the honorable Senator, and I ask the Senate, if they will not require this simple little apparatus to be insisted upon. It is simply a mattress that takes up no room on board ship. It is the bed in which you sleep, supplied with water and with bread. I submit that it is such an apparatus as should be required to be carried for public safety and for the individual safety of those who embark on these dangerous crafts. I have no interest in this patent right, and I presume the honorable Senator did not mean to insinuate that I had.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly not.

Mr. NYE. No, sir; I never knew enough to patent right anything; but I know enough to want to save my life, and want the honorable Senator to help me. If his neighbor has patented a thing that will save it, I want it to be tried. If my friend was drowning he would not stop to inquire whether the thing that could save him was patented before he took hold of it.

I rejoice in these inventions. It is the duty of Congress to compel these passenger-carriers on the ocean and river to provide for the safety of passengers. That is the duty of Congress, and I ask Congress to perform that duty, whether it is acceptable to the ship-owners or not. The owners will not pay for it, but you and I who ride pay for it. The cost of fitting it up is a part of the cost of the ship or of the boat, and those who travel are assessed a full quota in view of all the cost. One life is worth more than a dozen mattresses or a life-boat, and the struggling victim from carelessness or accident upon the ocean waves would sing praises to Congress if he had a mattress to which he could hold that would not sink when it was soaked with water. These life preservers that the Senator from Kansas talks about are good for nothing. If they are made of rubber one single spark of fire will let them out so that they will not buoy up a fly.

Mr. MORTON. My friend's argument proves everything except the point in issue, and that is, before all the ship-owners shall be obliged to buy this patent some evidence should be furnished that this self-bailing apparatus is valuable.

Mr. NYE. I know nothing of self-bailing. I am talking only about what I know of. I hope the honorable Senator will do the same thing. I do not know anything about these self-bailers. Does the Senator?

Mr. MORTON. No; I want to be informed.

Mr. NYE. I am not speaking of self-bailers, but of cork mattresses that I do know something about. My friend from Oregon can amuse us in regard to the self-bailing apparatus. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. President, I say again to the Senator from Indiana that those ship-owners will not furnish any life-saving apparatus unless Congress imposes the duty upon them, and it is not for the ship-owners to determine what is necessary. It is for Congress, having the power and in view of the responsibility that rests upon them. For every ship that goes out freighted with human beings Congress is responsible if it does not compel the owners of that ship to provide means for the safety of every passenger; and Congress becomes guilty in this case, the power being reposed in them, if they do not exercise it.

If the honorable Senator from Indiana can get a better thing than Golding's cork mattress I am content to say "Golding's cork mattress or other appliance answering the same purpose." I have no objection to that modification. I have no interest in this matter; but I have found lying on my desk—indeed it was put into my hands a year ago—a book that I laid before the honorable Senator, and the moment I did so he cried out "Patent right," and dropped the book. It is a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and by one of his ablest assistants. If the honorable Senator will read it he will know when this improvement was patented, if it ever was, and he will see the shape of it. He will see its beneficial effects; that it takes up no room in the ship, and there is precisely the trouble in regard to the life-preserving apparatus. The owners of these ships want every inch of room for freight and passengers, and they will not make room for these dead weights to protect their passengers at sea. You may put in the law a requirement that they shall have ten life-boats and they will go with four or five. I have seen that myself frequently. I have seen times when there was occasion to use life-boats and they were not to be found. They were not on board in compliance with the law. Now, Mr. President, I have done my duty. If Senators here do not think it is worth while to protect human life on board steamships, be it so, but no drowning man shall say to me that I did not do what I could to save him.

Mr. CORBETT. I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada whether the provision already in the bill does not cover his case.

Mr. NYE. No; it does not.

Mr. CORBETT. If we put in the bill a provision that some man's mattress shall be used, then when some one else invents one that is supposed to be better we must change the law.

Mr. NYE. Of course; and it ought to be done.

Mr. CORBETT. The bill is now framed in such a way that it will admit of any patent or any improvement that may be considered the best.

Mr. NYE. I ask the Senator from Oregon whether there is anything which says they must carry any kind of a mattress?

Mr. CORBETT. I suppose they have to carry mattresses for the people to sleep on.

Mr. NYE. But it does not say so.

Mr. CORBETT. There is no law that requires that, I believe, but it is customary I think to carry a mattress.

Mr. NYE. What I want to know of the honorable Senator who has this bill in charge is to tell me whether there is anything in it about a cork mattress. I am willing to strike out Golding's name. I do not care anything about Golding, but I think we should require such a mattress to be carried. Let me illustrate by the case of a steamer going to California on which the Senator and I have often traveled. There were four or five of us in the state-room. Suppose we had two of these mattresses in the state-room and a collision or accident should occur; we could go over into the Pacific ocean with perfect safety and wait until the regular appliance could be lowered to save us. Take the case of the burning of the Golden Gate when it burned from the center each way and drove the people maddened to death. I ask the honorable Senator if they had had these mattresses would not every one of them have been saved?

Mr. CORBETT. I have traveled during the past eighteen years between here and the Pacific coast from time to time; I have made a great many trips; and I think I am as desirous of saving my life and the lives of the passengers traveling on that route and other routes as any other person; and I have amended this bill in such manner that I think it will cover the entire case. If we amend it by inserting a requirement that some particular patent shall be used other amendments will be proposed in the House to adopt somebody else's mattress, and it will prevent the bill from passing. I am sure we cannot pass the bill if we particularize the different patents which shall be used. The bill as it now stands provides that the inspectors shall authorize the substitution, for the portion of such life-boats diminished, life-rafts or other contrivance to insure the safety of all the passengers and crew. The law now requires them to furnish life-preservers. Those are supposed to answer the purpose until they can get some other contrivance, some life-rafts or life-boats. I ask that the bill may be passed as amended by the committee.

Mr. STEWART. I concur with what has been said as to the fact that ship-owners will not supply themselves with the various conveniences that have been invented for saving life. If the ship is lost they have no particular interest in saving the passengers, as under such circumstances passengers are annoying to them because they have lost their money; and, strange as it may be, the owners are generally cold-blooded enough to be willing that the passengers should go if the ship goes. But there is a great deal of intrinsic difficulty in this whole business, and I believe that the Committee on Commerce, if they will devote themselves to devising means for having a proper system of inspection, a proper board of inspection, would remedy many of the evils under which we labor. The trouble now is that the laws are disregarded. We should have some board of inspection of more reliability than our present one. Great Britain is far in advance of us in this particular. She takes her retired admirals to inspect not only the vessels but the commanders and officers of the boats, and succeeds much better than we do in enforcing her regulations. I believe the Committee on Commerce ought to devise some plan whereby there shall be responsibility in carrying out these regulations; and I believe this bill does require some further amendment. I do not think it is safe to designate patents by name; we should designate the article to be secured, and then we should have some board of officers that we could trust in making the selection. I think the whole business demands the serious consideration of Congress, not only for making regulations, but to provide for their enforcement. Most of the trouble is that our present regulations are badly enforced, and that the passengers are generally lost when the ship is, in many cases on account of the neglect to furnish the appliances the law now requires.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to move an adjournment.

Mr. CORBETT. I hope we shall not adjourn until we pass this bill.

Mr. COLE. I should like to know when this bill will be in order again if we adjourn without passing it to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It will be the unfinished business, and will come up to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. COLE. I think it exceedingly important that this bill should be passed before we adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Of course this bill will be in order to-morrow. I will give way to the Senator from Indiana, who asks me to do so.

Mr. MORTON. Here is a patent right designated by name which every ship-owner in the United States is required to buy. Whether it is the best patent or not will be found by experience; we do not know. The honorable Senator from Nevada, it turns out, does not know anything about it, according to his own confession. He has an advertisement that he says was put on his desk a year ago. I saw it a few minutes ago.

Mr. NYE. I have seen the mattress.

Mr. MORTON. But I presume the Senator has never tried it. All that he knows about it is what we all know, that cork is light. That is about the substance of his knowledge on the subject, but he requires every ship-owner to buy these cork mattresses. Of course, when he is required to buy it by law of Congress, the patentee can charge what he pleases, and the ship-owners are in his hands. Then this bill by another provision requires ship-owners to buy a certain patent right for bailing life-boats. Of course they are in the hands of that patentee. Now, sir, before we put all the shipowners into the hands of these patentees, there ought to be some evidence before the Senate that these are the best patents; that they are valuable. We have no evidence before the Senate on that subject. It may be a joke here, but it will not be a joke to them if they are required to buy these things.

Mr. NYE. There are a number of official certificates here.

Mr. MORTON. The Senate has not seen them.

Mr. NYE. I have.

Mr. MORTON. I say the Senate has not.

Mr. NYE. It is not my fault that the Senate has not seen them.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to remind the Senate that we shall be obliged to hold night sessions every night till the end of the session. It is after ten o'clock, and is time that we should adjourn. I have heard so much about mattresses that I should like to go home and try one. [Laughter.] I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON presented seventeen petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will fully acknowledge the obligations of the Christian religion; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, asking Congress to institute such inquiries and to inaugurate such measures as will secure to American shipping in Spanish ports an equalization of tonnage dues and port charges with those imposed upon the most favored nation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, recommending the passage of the bill introduced by Mr. CONKLING prohibiting secret sales or purchases of gold or bonds on account of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, praying the passage of a law for the protection of copyright for works of art; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. POMEROY. I have received, and desire to present, a petition from a large number of citizens, heads of families for the most part, living in the State of Kansas on the rivers known as the Solomons and Republican rivers, in which they represent that the Indians who committed depredations last year, for which the Government went to war with them, and who, it was supposed from the report of General Custer and others were killed, have returned, and during the last ten or twelve days have commenced depredations again upon the settlements; and they ask that they may be protected, and urge that vigilant and strenuous efforts shall be made on the part of the Government to that effect. I sympathize with these settlers, but I do not know what I can do more than move to refer this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY also presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, a petition of citizens of Maine, a petition of citizens of New York, and a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution as will grant the right of suffrage to women equally with men; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will fully recognize the obligations of the Christian religion; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NYE presented the petition of Mary E. Hill, praying compensation for services as nurse in the Army, and for reimbursement of moneys expended to aid suffering soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of John P. Brown, secretary and dragoman of the American legation at Constantinople, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of O. H. Dockery and others, members of the House of Representatives from the Southern States, praying the passage of the bill to pay loyal citizens in the States lately in rebellion for services rendered in taking the United States census in 1860; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. No. 639) providing for a more efficient provisional government for Mississippi;

A bill (S. No. 662) to carry out the reconstruction acts of the State of Georgia;

A bill (S. No. 708) to repeal so much of the act passed June 25, 1868, as provides for the admission of the State of Georgia to representation in Congress and to provide a provisional government therein, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 716) to provide for the reassembling of the constitutional convention of the State of Georgia, and to prescribe the duties of the same;

A bill (S. No. 733) to enable the people of Georgia to form a State government republican in form;

A bill (S. No. 962) supplemental to an act to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 106) relative to fixing an exterior line in New York harbor on both sides of Hudson river.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 854) to further the administration of justice, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following resolutions and memorials, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolutions adopted at a meeting at Macon, Georgia, approving the policy of R. B. Bullock, Governor of that State, and asking for the passage of a law for the protection of loyal citizens of that State;

The petition of L. P. Gudger, of Georgia, praying such legislation as will protect Union men in that State;

The petition of citizens of Augusta, in the State of Georgia, praying for relief against violations of the reconstruction acts of Congress in that State, and for security of life and property.

A petition of citizens of Georgia, praying the passage of a law for their protection in the enjoyment of their civil rights;

A letter of the Governor of Georgia to the Congress of the United States, in relation to the laws under which that State was to have been admitted to representation in Congress;

A memorial of the representatives of the colored voters of Georgia in convention assembled, in relation to the action of the Legislature in expelling twenty-nine colored members from that body;

Resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Republican party held in Atlanta, Georgia, February 15, 1869, relative to the political condition in that State;

Resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of Columbus, Georgia, setting forth the troubled condition of affairs in that State, and praying the intervention of Congress for the protection of loyal persons;

A petition of citizens of Georgia, praying that the reconstruction acts may be enforced, to the end that the Legislature be purged of members illegally elected, and that those duly elected be restored to their seats therein;

A petition of Charles R. Pate, of Georgia, praying that protection may be extended to Union men of that State;

A petition of citizens of Georgia, praying that section three of the eleventh article may be stricken from the constitution of that State, and that protection be afforded from the outrage upon their legal rights attempted to be imposed by that section, and that officers not elected under the reconstruction acts may be declared not eligible;

Resolutions adopted by the National Union Republican Association of Georgia, approving the action of the National Union Republican party against the repudiation of the national indebtedness; approving the adoption of the fourteenth article to the Constitution of the United States; approving the policy of Governor Bullock, and in relation to the expulsion of the colored members from the Legislature of that State; indorsing the platform of the National Republican party adopted at Chicago; and that Hon. Joshua Hill and Hon. H. V. M. Miller may not be admitted to seats in the Senate as Senators from that State; and

A memorial of the Corn and Flour Exchange of Baltimore city, against any further postponement of the fifty-per-cent. clause of the present bankrupt law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1987) to define felonies and misdemeanors and regulate peremptory challenges, have instructed me to report it back adversely, and with the recommendation that it do not pass. The statutes already provide, in the opinion of the committee, for challenges in such cases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1624) to preserve the purity of elections in the several Territories of the United States, have instructed me to report it back and to move that it lie on the table, upon the ground that there is not sufficient time during the present session, owing to the pressure of business, to mature, perfect, and pass the bill; although the committee are in favor of the principle of it, which is to have a registration law to protect the ballot-box in the Territories. It is only because there is not sufficient time to mature and perfect it that they report at this time that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to report back to the Senate, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan, with the accompanying papers and an adverse written report, signed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] and myself. I understand that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SAWYER] propose to submit a report on the other side, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] refuses to take any part whatever in the decision; so that, under these circumstances, it is impossible for the committee to make any specific recommendation on the subject, and the whole matter, therefore, is referred to the Senate. I ask to have the report printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to state that a portion of the Committee on Private Land Claims dissent from the conclusions of the report presented, and propose during the day to submit a report, which is now being copied.

Mr. SAWYER subsequently submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Private Land Claims on the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was recommended the bill (H. R. No. 1046) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolutions, reported adversely thereon:

A bill (S. No. 21) to authorize and provide for the construction of a military and postal road from Galveston, in the State of Texas, to Fort Gibson, in the Indian territory, with a branch to Little Rock, in Arkansas;

A bill (S. No. 387) concerning the liability of ship-owners, maritime liens, salvage, and the jurisdiction in admiralty;

A bill (S. No. 504) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the warehousing system by establishing bonded warehouses, and for other purposes";

A bill (S. No. 523) to regulate the appointment and promotion of consular clerks;

A bill (S. No. 525) to authorize the establishment of customs ports of delivery on the Pacific coast of the United States, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 572) to incorporate the Island City Harbor Company;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 125) authorizing the issue of a new register to the American-built schooner Milton Badger;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 44) relating to the sale of the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) to authorize the leasing of certain real estate in San Francisco.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions, memorials, and resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

The petition of Thomas Dickerson, praying the intervention of Congress to protect all persons engaged in navigation from illegal exactions by the various tonnage tax laws imposed by States, cities, and sea-port towns;

The memorial of Albert Elmore, collector of customs at Mobile, Alabama, praying an increase of the compensation of inspectors;

The memorial of the Hannibal and St. Joseph, Toledo, and Wabash, and the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Companies, relative to bridges across the Mississippi river;

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of San Diego;

A petition of citizens of California, praying an appropriation of $30,000 for turning San Diego river into False bay;

The petition of F. A. Merrill, praying that an American register be granted to the bark Carlotta;

The memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation for the purpose of building a light-house on the point of the reef at Bailey's harbor;

A petition of assistant engineers of the United States revenue service, praying that assistant engineers of the United States revenue service may receive full and formal commissions, to which their positions and the services required of them entitle them, as a mark of rank and as a distinction from other officers made simply by appointment or warrant, and for a revision of the laws relative to the distribution of prize money among revenue officers so as to include them according to rank among those entitled to receive it;

The memorial of Thomas E. Trueworthy, praying an appropriation of $100,000 to him for the purpose of removing obstructions to the navigation of the Colorado river; and

A petition from certain Hungarian citizens of the United States, praying for the establishment of a United States consulate general at Buda-Pesth.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the report of the committee be concurred in with regard to the bills reported adversely, so as to have them indefinitely postponed, that they may not go on the Calendar.

Mr. NYE. The effect of that is to send them over to the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done. It leads to debate every time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the motion be put.

Mr. SUMNER. It makes no difference.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1880) to relieve certain persons therein named from the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of James F. Joy, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 236) for the relief of James F. Joy; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

POST OFFICE AT OMAHA.

Mr. THAYER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the erection of a post-office building at Omaha, Nebraska.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had this day approved and signed the bill (S. No. 935) to provide for a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating information of his compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th of January last, requesting the President to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to detail an officer to select from the public lands such prominent points upon the coast of Oregon, Washington Territory, and Alaska, as in his judgment may be necessary for light-house purposes, in view of the future commercial necessity of the Pacific coast; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that he had been directed by the House, in compliance with a request of the Senate, to return the joint resolution (S. R. No. 228) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty certain submarine telegraph cable.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2003) to authorize the county commissioners of Ada county, Idaho, to select a site for a territorial prison, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SITE FOR JAIL IN IDAHO.

Mr. NYE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill which has just been sent to us from the House of Representatives with regard to the selection of a site for a prison in Idaho Territory. The bill makes no appropriation. The appropriation is already made. Unless the bill is passed now they will have to wait for two years from this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2003) to authorize the county commissioners of Ada county, Idaho, to select a site for a territorial prison, was read three times, and passed

IMPORTATION OF SCIENTIFIC APPARATUS.

MR. SHERMAN: The Committee on Finance yesterday reported an amendment to a House joint resolution which disposes of quite a number of cases that are upon the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent to have that joint resolution taken up and the amendment acted upon, so that the Senate Committee on Finance may know what course to pursue with regard to the other bills. It is in regard to philosophical instruments that have been imported by various colleges. I presume there will be no objection to the amendment, and in that way we can dispose of several bills on the subject.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 327) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duty on certain meridian circles was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Finance reported the joint resolution with an amendment, to strike out all of the original resolution after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to remit the duties on a meridian circle, imported for the observatory at Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts, and a meridian circle imported for the observatory connected with the Chicago University, at Chicago, in the State of Illinois.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That all books, maps, charts, statues, statuary, busts, and casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, and all paintings and drawings, etchings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, regalia, gems, and all collections of antiquities, and mathematical, philosophical, and scientific apparatus imported into the United States since the 1st day of May, A. D. 1868, be admitted free of duty: Provided, That the same be specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

MR. CONKLING. I move to amend the amendment by adding these words, which I ask the Secretary to insert in some place where they will be appropriate, "and chimes of bells of a kind not made in this country."

MR. POMEROY. I think we had better insert "railroad iron" also.

MR. MORRILL, of Vermont. I trust the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will either be withdrawn or will not prevail. We have a great number of establishments in the country that make bells, and we produce the copper which forms more than ninety per cent. of the raw material for the making of the bells; and the parties who desire the particular class of bells instanced by the Senator from New York, chimes, are usually wealthy churches who are able to pay for them. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

MR. GRIMES. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that we also have manufacturers of scientific instruments. I believe there is not anybody in the world who is able to excel Mr. Alvin Clark, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, in the manufacture of telescopes and articles of that description, and he is not the only one.

MR. NYE. Nor Spencer, of New York.

MR. GRIMES. The Senator from Nevada adds "Spencer, of New York." Why should the Senate delay protection to these manufacturers of philosophical instruments? Then I should like to know why it is that we should not exempt the chimes of bells when we are going to allow all these little corporations throughout the country organized for literary purposes and library associations to import gems? What is the necessity of permitting them to import gems? What is the use in that?

MR. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that the meridian circle could not be manufactured in this country, and had to be manufactured abroad.

MR. GRIMES. The question of the meridian circle is not before us.

MR. SHERMAN. I will answer the Senator from Iowa, and perhaps he will be satisfied. The gems referred to here are the gems and regalia that are used by Odd Fellows and Masons, and I am advised of no other class by which they are used except those societies. I will say that the proposition as now introduced by the committee has been the law for years, and was not changed except by the tariff act of 1864. That law repealed the old exception that had been continued almost time out of mind by which colleges and schools and societies brought in these articles free of duty. It was found that so many applications were made to Congress to remit duties for charitable institutions—there is one for the Cornell University; there is one for the meridian circle in Boston; there is one for the meridian circle in Chicago—so many applications of this kind came for relief and remission of duties that we thought it better to restore the old provision of the law.

The Senator asked me why bells were not inserted. Simply because bells are manufactured in this country, and bells have never been exempted from duty except in special cases. We did exempt from duty a chime of bells that were put up in a college in Indiana, but there the copper was exported to France and brought back here, and the whole thing was simply an act of charity, and under the special circumstances of that case we did remit the duties on the bells. I have no objection, however, to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York except that any enlargement of this free list will naturally embarrass this bill, which is simply the restoration of the old law, which was repealed probably by inadvertence. I trust, therefore, that those who are in favor of granting this relief will not embarrass it with amendments. I cannot myself give any good reason why chimes of bells should not be introduced; but it would introduce a new element not contained in the old law, and would probably create some embarrassment in the passage of the bill. That is all there is of it. No institution, I believe, in my own State has any application for the remission of duties on articles of this sort. This only applies to institutions scattered through the country. There are several House bills which have been sent to us for the remission of duties, and we propose this general statute instead.

MR. GRIMES. The Senator from Illinois seems to be under the apprehension that this bill is only intended to exempt from duty a meridian circle. That is not the bill at all.

MR. TRUMBULL. That was the bill.

MR. GRIMES. That was the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. Now I want to show the Senator and the Senate what this bill is; and let me say it applies not only to observatories and colleges and universities, but to every little incorporated society, library, or otherwise throughout the whole length and breadth of the land.

That all books, maps, charts, statues, statuary, busts, and casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, and all paintings and drawings, etchings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, regalia, gems, and all collections of antiquities—

I do not know what that cannot be made to include—and mathematical, philosophical, and scientific apparatus imported into the United States since the 1st day of May, A. D. 1868, be admitted free of duty: Provided, That the same be specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes—

It includes all sorts of purposes almost—or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

It is not even required to be for the use of a college or library, but if it is imported by the order of a college or a university it is to be admitted free of duty. The language is "for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States." Now, Mr. President, while I am in favor of throwing as few obstacles as possible upon the importation of such articles as are enumerated in this bill, I am not quite prepared to vote to put three hundred per cent. duty upon copper that is used in all sorts of domestic purposes, and at the same time entirely exempt from duty such articles as are enumerated in this bill.

of half past twelve o'clock having arrived, the special order fixed for that hour, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress, is before the Senate.

MR. SHERMAN. I hope we shall be allowed to have a vote on this bill.

MR. ANTHONY. I am willing that the special order shall lie over informally for a few minutes for that purpose.

MR. POMEROY. It will be impossible to get a vote very soon on that bill.

MR. ANTHONY. I wish it to be understood that the special order is only laid over informally.

MR. SHERMAN. If there is a general opposition to this bill I will not stand for it.

MR. CONKLING. I have no opposition to it, although I should like to say a word in explanation of my amendment whenever it is in order to do so.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is asked that the special order be passed over informally for the purpose of proceeding with the bill.

MR. DRAKE. I object.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the special order is before the Senate.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED COPPER—VETO.

MR. WILLIAMS. With the consent of the Senator from Rhode Island I move to lay aside informally the special order and take up House bill No. 1827.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels bound to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, transmitting a bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores, with the objections of the President of the United States thereto. The veto message will be read.

The Secretary read the veto message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

The accompanying bill, entitled "An act regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores," is, for the following reasons, returned, without my approval, to the House of Representatives, in which branch of Congress it originated.

Its immediate effect will be to diminish the public receipts, for the object of the bill cannot be accomplished without seriously affecting the importation of copper and copper ores, from which a considerable revenue is at present derived. While thus impairing the resources of the Government, it imposes an additional tax upon an already overburdened people, who should not be further impoverished that monopolies may be fostered and corporations enriched.

It is represented, and the declaration seems to be sustained by evidence, that the duties for which this bill provides are nearly or quite sufficient to prohibit the importation of certain foreign ores of copper. Its enactment, therefore, will prove detrimental to the shipping interests of the nation, and at the same time destroy the business, for many years successfully established, of smelting home ores in connection with a smaller amount of the imported articles. This business, it is credibly asserted, has heretofore yielded the larger share of the copper production of the country, and thus the industry which this legislation is designed to encourage is actually less than that which will be destroyed by the passage of this bill.

It seems also to be evident that the effect of this measure will be to enhance, by seventy per cent., the cost of blue vitriol—an article extensively used in dyeing and in the manufacture of printed and colored cloths. To produce such an augmentation in the price of this commodity will be to discriminate against other great branches of domestic industry, and by increasing their cost to expose them most unfairly to the effects of foreign competition. Legislation can neither be wise nor just which seeks the welfare of a single interest at the expense and to the injury of many and varied interests at least equally important and equally deserving the consideration of Congress. Indeed, it is difficult to find any reason which will justify the interference of Government with any legitimate industry, except so far as may be rendered necessary by the requirements of the revenue. As has already been stated, however, the legislative intervention proposed in the present instance will diminish, not increase, the public receipts.

The enactment of such a law is urged as necessary for the relief of certain mining interests upon Lake Superior, which, it is alleged, are in a greatly depressed condition, and can only be sustained by an enhancement of the price of copper. If this result should follow the passage of the bill a tax for the exclusive benefit of a single class would be imposed upon the consumers of copper throughout the entire country not warranted by any need of the Government, and the avails of which would not in any degree find their way into the Treasury of the nation. If the miners of Lake Superior are in a condition of want it cannot be justly affirmed that the Government should extend charity to them in preference to those of its citizens who in other portions of the country suffer in like manner from destitution. Least of all should the endeavor to aid them be based upon a method so uncertain and indirect as that contemplated by the bill, and which moreover proposes to continue the exercise of its beneficence through an indefinite period of years. It is, besides, reasonable to hope that positive suffering from want, if it really exists, will prove but temporary in a region where agricultural labor is so much in demand and so well compensated. A careful examination of the subject appears to show that the present low price of copper, which alone has induced any depression the mining interests of Lake Superior may have recently experienced, is due to causes which it is wholly impolitic, if not impracticable, to contravene by legislation. These causes are, in the main, an increase in the general supply of copper, owing to the discovery and working of remarkably productive mines, and to a coincident restriction in the consumption and use of copper, by the substitution of other and cheaper metals for industrial purposes. It is now sought to resist, by artificial means, the action of natural laws; to place the people of the United States, in respect to the enjoyment and use of an essential commodity, upon a different basis from other nations, and especially to compensate certain private and sectional interests for the changes and losses which are always incident to industrial progress.

Although providing for an increase of duties, the proposed law does not even come within the range of protection in the fair acceptance of the term. It does not look to the fostering of a young and feeble interest, with a view to the ultimate attainment of strength and the capacity of self-support. It appears to assume that the present inability for successful production is inherent and permanent, and is more likely to increase than to be gradually overcome; yet in spite of this it proposes by the exercise of the law-making power to sustain that interest, and to impose it in hopeless perpetuity as a tax upon the competent and beneficent industries of the country.

The true method for the mining interests of Lake Superior to obtain relief, if relief is needed, is to endeavor to make their great natural resources fully available by reducing the cost of production. Special or class legislation cannot remedy the evils which this bill is designed to meet. They can only be overcome by laws which will effect a wise, honest, and economical administration of the Government, a reestablishment of the specie standard of value, and an early adjustment of our system of State, municipal, and national taxation, (especially the latter,) upon the fundamental principle that all taxes, whether collected under the internal revenue or under a tariff, shall interfere as little as possible with the productive energies of the people.

The bill is therefore returned, in the belief that the true interests of the Government and of the people require that it should not become a law.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 22, 1869.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, "Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?" and on that question the Clerk will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 38, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Catell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Warner, Welch, Wiley, and Williams—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, McGreevy, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Whyte—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wilson, and Yates—16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 38 and the nays are 12. Two thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative, the bill is passed.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now call up the special order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress. It reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congressional Printer is hereby authorized and directed, on and from the 4th day of March, 1869, to report and publish the debates in Congress under the direction of the joint Committee on Public Printing.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose aforesaid there shall be appropriated and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—dollars,

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, at the close of the last session of Congress, in an appropriation bill, was a section repealing from and after the 4th of March, 1869, all acts authorizing the publication of the congressional debates, and directing the joint Committee on Printing to invite proposals for the publication of the actual proceedings and debates in Congress upon a plan and specifications to be previously published by them, and to ascertain the cost of such publication by the Superintendent of Public Printing, and to report as soon as practicable such proposals and estimate of cost to Congress.

In conformity with this direction of Congress the joint Committee on Printing invited proposals and instructed the Congressional Printer, who has succeeded to the office of Superintendent of Public Printing, to make estimates of the cost of printing the debates in the Government Printing Office. Only two proposals were received. One was received from the present contractors, Rives & Bailey. The other was received from Mr. Crowell, of New York. It is but fair to say in the beginning that the Congressional Globe by Rives & Bailey has been printed to the entire satisfaction of Congress. The work has been done well and promptly, and we have had no complaint of it. Like good air and good water and good health, we do not hear anything about it until we begin to miss it. It is reported that they have made a large sum of money out of their contract, and I suppose it is true. It is very proper that they should. Men who put in capital and skill and business ability and integrity ought to make money.

The proposals of Mr. Crowell are accompanied with abundant testimonials of his ability, professional, mechanical, and pecuniary, to transact the business.

The bid of the present contractors is considerably larger than either of the others. The other proposal is so near that of the Congressional Printer that the difference is not worth estimating. There is $10,000 difference in the bids.

Under these circumstances the committee, not agreeing entirely as to the best mode of proceeding with the work, directed me to report two joint resolutions, one of which has just been read. My own judgment is that the will of Congress will be best carried out by giving this work to the Government Printer. If it is to be taken from the present contractors (and there is a responsible bid considerably lower than theirs) it seems to me it should be done by the Government Printer, unless there is a considerable difference between his estimate and the bid of the lowest contractor. The difference is very small indeed. We have a Government Printing Office which has worked very well—has been, we think, the means of saving large sums of money to the Government; and if we print anything there I do not know why we should not print the Globe there as well as anything else.

I anticipate that any change will cause considerable annoyance to Congress, and especially to those who will probably be charged with the immediate oversight of it. I look with a good deal of apprehension, if it should please the Senate to keep me for the next two years in the place where I am now, to the troubles we shall have from any change. But these are the days of economy, and the bid of Rives & Bailey is much higher than either of the others.

Mr. FERRY. What is the difference? How much would be saved by a change?

Mr. ANTHONY. The bid of Messrs. Rives & Bailey is according to report $389,000 against the estimate of the Congressional Printer of $276,000. But these figures are subject to considerable reductions; and I think the difference between the two bids, making the proper corrections, is about fifty-five or sixty thousand dollars a Congress; that is, for two years.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the chairman of the committee whether or not in that $55,000 there is not a difference of some $20,000 in regard to the binding.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; my estimate deducts the binding. Leaving out the binding and the paper—the paper being an uncertain item and the binding being estimated by the Congressional Printer so much lower than by either of the other bidders that it would probably be for the interest of the Government to have it done at the printing office as it is now—leaving out both of these items I think the difference is about what I stated; but my friend from Maryland, who has investigated this matter carefully, may have the exact figures, and if so I should defer to them.

Mr. GRIMES. What do you recommend?

Mr. ANTHONY. That the work be given to the Congressional Printer, with very great doubts whether any system can be initiated that will give so much satisfaction as the one we have now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much will it save?

Mr. ANTHONY. Fifty-five or sixty thousand dollars a Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is two years?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir. The saving will be fifty-five or sixty thousand dollars on the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It is rather more than that now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the estimate?

Mr. ANTHONY. The estimate is considerably more than that, and the reductions to which I have referred reduce the amount.

Mr. WHYTE. As a member of the joint Committee on Printing I deem it proper to offer a substitute for the resolution which is now before the Senate, and I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out all of the resolution after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That the joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing is hereby authorized to contract, on behalf of the General Government, with Rives & Bailey for the reporting and publishing of the debates in Congress for the term of two years on and from the 4th day of March, 1869, in accordance with the proposition submitted by them, (excluding paper and binding.) Provided, That before the United States shall be called on to pay for any reporting or publication of the debates the accounts therefor shall be submitted to the joint Committee on Public Printing, or such other officer or officers of Congress as they may designate; and on their or his approbation thereof, as being in all respects according to the contracts, it shall be paid for from the Treasury of the United States, after having passed to the proper accounting officers thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That in case the joint Committee on Public Printing are unable to conclude a contract with said Rives & Bailey, or that they be unable to fulfill any contract that they may make, the joint Committee on Printing be authorized to have the debates reported and printed under the direction of the Congressional Printer at the Government Printing Office.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose aforesaid there be appropriated and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated — dollars.

Mr. WHYTE. Before proceeding to make a very brief statement to the Senate in regard to this matter of printing, I move that the time of the morning hour be extended twenty minutes in order to enable me to dispose of this matter.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope that motion will not be made until the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations shall come in.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no doubt that by common consent this matter will be allowed to go on after the expiration of the morning hour. It is a subject that we must dispose of.

Mr. WHYTE. With that understanding I will proceed. As the chairman of the Committee on Printing has stated, between this time and the 4th of March it is necessary for the two Houses of Congress to determine in what manner the reporting and publication of their debates must be continued, whether by a new contract with some contractor or by directing its execution at the Government Printing Office under the supervision of the Congressional Printer. The last act, under which the present contract with Rives & Bailey was made, was passed on the 4th of July, 1864, (Statutes-at-Large, p. 392 of vol. 13.) By a subsequent act of Congress (vol. 14, p. 470, sec. 11) notice was given that on the 3d of March, 1869, this contract should cease, and on the 20th of July, 1868, all the laws on the subject were repealed, and the contract ends with the present Congress. It is therefore absolutely necessary, if it is in contemplation to continue this parliamentary history of our country, that some immediate action should be had in the premises.

It seems to me to be utterly idle to consider Mr. Crowell's proposition, to undertake at this late moment to make a contract with a private individual from a distant city, unprepared with presses and type, buildings and materials, reporters and proof-readers, and all the other paraphernalia of such an undertaking, for the execution of this work, beginning on the first day of the session of the Forty-First Congress. In the brief statement which I wish to make I shall not, therefore, consider the bid of Mr. Crowell, whose Christian name is as uncertain as are his proposals, for he appears on page 5 of the report of the committee as John T., Joseph T., and W. T. I do not think it at all consistent with prudence or common sense for the small difference between his bid and the estimate of the Congressional Printer to embark upon a sea of uncertainty with so important a work before us.

The whole matter seems to me to resolve itself into the inquiry whether we should for a small sum and in a spasm of retrenchment abandon a long-tried and successful mode of presenting to the people a full and authentic report of the congressional debates and enter upon a new mode; that is, the reporting and publication of the debates under the direction of the Congressional Printer at the Government Printing Office.

It is true the estimate of the Congressional Printer and the amount paid to the contractors for the Thirty-Ninth Congress are both apparently far below the present proposal of Rives & Bailey, but a close examination of the items in detail shows the difference between the two last estimates really to be about twenty-six thousand dollars a Congress, or $13,000 a year. The report of the committee, made in pursuance of the resolution of July 20, 1868, on page 5, shows the estimates to be as follows:

Rives & Bailey.....	$389,454 96
J. T. Crowell.....	261,149 30
Congressional Printer.....	276,494 84

for two sessions of Congress.

This estimate is made upon the basis of the cost of the Daily and Congressional Globe for the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Now, the reason why the proprietors of the Globe continued the work at the old prices for the Thirty-Ninth Congress was because of the sale of sets of back numbers for new members, which is to terminate on the 4th of March next. If, then, you add to the amount paid them for the current work of that Congress the sum of $49,000 for these back numbers, the amount would stand thus:

Rives & Bailey, (page 3 of Report No. 248.)
A. Paid for quarto Globes.....	$156,939 70
B. Paid for Daily Globes.....	66,520 89
C. Back sets.....	223,460 59
	49,000 00
D. Extra compensation to reporters.....	272,460 59
	16,000 00
It leaves amount paid.....	$288,460 59
Now, then, take their proposals, made to the joint committee, for the future, thus.....	$389,454 96
Deduct from this the new service required, to wit, 500 Daily Globes at.....	$9,000 00
Binding 84,152 volumes.....	66,059 32
	75,059 32
And then take the amount paid for Thirty-Ninth Congress.....	314,395 64
And we have an excess of.....	$25 935 05

The Senate will perceive that under a new contract all the demand for back numbers is cut off, and the stereotype plates used for the past work will be lost to the contractors, and yet they are required to do some seventy-five to eighty thousand dollars' worth of additional work, besides which, under the eight-hour system enforced by congressional legislation, a very considerable burden has been placed upon these contractors.

To save this sum, then, it is proposed to take the work from the present contractors and have it done at the Government Printing Office. It is conceded on all sides that the Government office is not large enough for this purpose and would have to be enlarged, and in addition, although no estimate is made of such an expense, can it be doubted that new officers at high salaries will be required to supervise all this work, and by this means a large sum added to the estimate of the Congressional Printer? No estimate of this additional expense is made by Mr. Derees, but who doubts that the moment you put this vast work in the Government Printing Office you are to create new officers to take charge of it at high salaries: proof-readers, superintendents, superintendents of the reportorial corps, &c., with enormous salaries? for it is not pretended that the force now employed at the Government Printing Office can discharge this additional service. I do not mean the compositors, but I mean the force of supervisors, of superintendents. Without knowing how many new officers—for there is no estimate of that; all that is left out of view—you will have to create to discharge their respective duties under this new proceeding, without knowing the salaries that they will demand—and every man who knows anything of the salaries paid now to printers and to foremen of composing-rooms and press-rooms, &c., knows that these men demand and receive high and sometimes exorbitant salaries, because they are men highly educated in their profession—without any estimate of all these items we are asked to commence a new system to save a paltry sum that will not be missed.

Again, I feel sure, from what I have learned in the investigation which it was my bounden duty to make as a member of the joint Committee on Printing that I might faithfully report to the Senate what I had learned upon the subject, that the estimate for binding is made too low by the Congressional Printer. He estimates the binding at fifty-two cents, and I am satisfied it cannot possibly be done at that price. Seventy-eight cents is the price which all the binders seem to consider as the fair and proper one.

And, remarkable to say, in an estimate made by an officer of the Government—made by the Congressional Printer, into whose hands it is sought to confide this highly important work of reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress—I find no estimate whatever for the folding of the quarto Globe, although if Senators will look at the report of the committee they will find that for the Thirty-Ninth Congress the sum of $8,479 09 was paid for folding alone. There is not one farthing estimated for that item on which that amount was paid for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and no explanation upon his part as to why it is not there.

Senators will see that I state it correctly: they will look upon page 3 of the report of the committee No. 248. Eight thousand four hundred and seventy-nine dollars and nine cents is the amount; and if they will look at the Congressional Printer's estimate on page 4, not one dollar is estimated for that work. One third of the difference, one third of the $25,000 for which I have shown these contractors at present offer to do the work exceeding what they received for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, is explained by this item, which is not included in the estimate.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire of my friend from Maryland what is the difference between the contract price of the Globe proprietors and the estimated cost by the Public Printer and the proposition made by Mr. Crowell?

Mr. WHYTE. The difficulty of coming at that, that the Congressional Printer has made the estimate in such a way that I have had to dissect it. I say there is a very material difference in his estimate from the estimate made by the Globe contractors, and a much less sum on Mr. Crowell's part, less even than the Congressional Printer. The difference, I suppose, is about forty thousand dollars.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the revised estimates of Mr. Crowell, making the necessary deduction for stereotyping, which was put into the Congressional Printer's estimate and not into Mr. Crowell's estimate, reduced the estimate of the Congressional Printer a little below that of Mr. Crowell, but the difference is very small either way.

Mr. WHYTE. I was speaking of the estimate as reported. I have seen this morning for the first time a correction by Mr. Crowell of his bid.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. WHYTE. A very great difference. He makes a difference of not less, if I remember correctly, than $16,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. About sixteen thousand dollars.

Mr. MORTON. Below the Globe?

Mr. WHYTE. No; above his former bid. The bid has nothing in it. When he is brought down to the point and sees the estimate of the Congressional Printer, and discovers that if that stands it will put him in a false light, he corrects it by showing a difference in the amount he bid for of $16,000; that is to say, now he increases his bid $16,000 over what it was when it was first presented to the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think there is anything unfair in this correction that Mr. Crowell makes. In the first place my friend from Maryland will remember we got from the Congressional Printer the actual cost of printing the debates of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, that being the last Congress for which the Globe had been completed and printed. Then we took the bid of Rives & Bailey and took the bid of Mr. Crowell and reduced each of them to the basis of the Thirty-Ninth Congress; that is to say, we ascertained what it would have cost to print the proceedings of the Thirty-Ninth Congress upon the bid of each of these persons. We then submitted this estimate to each of the bidders, to Rives & Bailey and to Mr. Crowell, to ask them if the reduction of their bid to the Globe of the Thirty-Ninth Congress had been properly made, as my friend will remember. Then each of them returned an answer showing some particulars in which the bids had not been correctly reduced. That of Rives & Bailey referred to an item which was put in all the bids, and therefore did not affect any of them, or affected them all alike. That of Mr. Crowell—

Mr. WHYTE. Will the chairman allow me to make a suggestion? Rives & Bailey did not alter their bid at all. All that they excepted to was that the $16,000 extra compensation voted by Congress to the reporters ought not to be charged against them; but that was a mistake on their part, because it was charged against everybody.

Mr. ANTHONY. But Mr. Crowell objected to the manner in which his bid had been reduced to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and explained his own meaning of his bid, which was all perfectly proper, because as the bid was not an offer for a contract, but merely a proposal, and if we had occasion to draw up a contract with him it would be proper that we should know precisely what his understanding of it was.

Mr. WHYTE. I did not mean to impute anything to Mr. Crowell at all. I only meant to say that upon the reexamination of the matter his statement shows that it would require $16,000 more than what he originally proposed to pay him according to his idea.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is so.

Mr. WHYTE. I have not considered his bid because Congress in no law that I know of has ever laid it down as a requirement that the lowest bid shall be taken, but in all the laws it is "the lowest and best bid." It must be both; and such was the character of his bid, as far as it came to me and as far as my mind took it in; such was his condition, without any means at his disposal here in Washington, without any presses, without any sort of preparation to go to work on the 4th of March, that I considered that that bid could never be considered the best bid, and therefore it was not worthy of consideration at all.

Mr. CAMERON. I used to know something about this business of printing. It was a long while ago, to be sure, and I do not know so much about it now; but I know enough to convince me that the printing of the Globe and the reporting also can be done for a great deal less money than we pay. The Senator from Maryland says that if we employ the Public Printing Office we shall have to add thirty or forty thousand dollars to the stock of the office.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator if he proposes to ask me a question?

Mr. CAMERON. No, sir.

Mr. WHYTE. I have not concluded.

Mr. CAMERON. I said the Senator from Maryland had stated in his speech that if we employed the Public Printer the Government would be put to the expense of some thirty-two thousand dollars, according to an estimate which was made for the purpose of restocking that Printing Office. I understand from the Public Printer that that sum will be required for the ordinary printing, but not a dollar more in consequence of this change. Persons acquainted with the printing business can very well understand that when you have an establishment perfectly stocked with its types and presses you can increase the amount of business very largely without correspondingly increasing the cost. In other words, you have to keep a great amount of type on hand that you may not use. You must have it whether you have a larger amount of work or a smaller amount. We must begin some time. We are paying too much money for this publication of the Globe. Everybody knows it, and yet everybody is disinclined to make a change, because it is believed to be unkind to the owners of the job. These gentlemen have made a large fortune out of it. Two generations of them, and two generations, of two families, making four generations, have made very large fortunes out of this Globe contract.

Mr. WHYTE. I must ask the Senator to allow me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. WHYTE. I gave way, but I desire to conclude what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland had the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from Maryland will excuse me. I thought he sat down.

Mr. WHYTE. I perceived that, and therefore I thought it my duty to interrupt you. I was going on to say that in the estimate of the Congressional Printer there is no calculation at all for the expense of folding.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sorry to interrupt my friend, but I know he wishes to make the statement with accuracy.

Mr. WHYTE. I do.

Mr. ANTHONY. The estimate of fifty-two cents a volume for binding includes the folding and gathering. The Congressional Printer told me so this morning, and he has just repeated it to me.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I am satisfied that his estimate is simply ridiculous.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the estimate of the foreman of the bindery.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not think another man engaged in the business can be found anywhere who will put such an estimate on the binding of these volumes. I have made inquiry and it is utterly impossible, if you deduct $8,000 from the amount calculated for the binding, that it can be done for any such price. Nor is there any estimate for wastage of paper. All that is lost sight of in the Congressional Printer's estimate, which all printers will tell you is a loss of from three to five per cent.

Besides all this there is no calculation for the wear and tear of machinery or for the presses, the wear of type, or of the buildings. There is not one dollar of estimate for all this; and yet I take it that when a contractor bids for Government work he brings into view all those expenses and adds a reasonable and proper profit, which nobody ought to be unwilling to allow him upon that estimate.

Nor is there anything in the estimate of the Congressional Printer to show that the paper estimated for is as good as or inferior to the paper now used or contemplated to be used by Rives & Bailey.

Again, on page 5 of Report No. 248, the estimate of the Congressional Printer for the Daily Globe—and I ask the attention of Senators to this important fact unexplained, and I ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing to explain it if he can, after his conversation with Mr. Derees or with anybody else—is $120,610 52; while the same work, as done by Rives & Bailey for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and this estimate is based upon the standard of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, amounted to $82,520 89, showing a difference in favor of Rives & Bailey of $38,089 63.

Mr. ANTHONY. But they do not propose to continue it at that price. Rives & Bailey will not continue to publish the Globe at the present prices.

Mr. WHYTE. I grant it; but I am showing that the estimate of the Congressional Printer upon the standard of the price which they received is $120,000. But then take their present proposition, and how do we find it? The Congressional Printer's estimate is $120,610 52; while the present bid of Rives & Bailey is $116,350 70; making a difference in favor of Rives & Bailey, on their present bid, of $4,259 82. It is in the quarto Globe, by some means or other, that the difference is made between Rives & Bailey's present bid and the estimate of the Congressional Printer; but in the Daily Globe, without any reason why, the estimate of the Congressional Printer exceeds their present bid for the same work $4,259 82.

Now, Mr. President, I say there is so much uncertainty in this estimate, so much that is inexplicable, so much that is not clear to the mind of the Senate, that they ought not to depart from that mode of printing and reporting these debates adopted in 1833, and only departed from in 1846, I think, or 1847, when it was given temporarily to the Union office and the National Intelligencer office, from whom Congress was glad enough to take it back and give it again to the Congressional Globe. With all this uncertainty, and for the purpose of saving so small a sum in a mere spasm of retrenchment, I say Congress ought not to do it. If you make a contract with these gentlemen you know exactly how much the Government has to pay. They are bound by their contract, and bound by a bond with it, and if it exceeds the amount which you have agreed to pay them it is their misfortune. But if you take the Congressional Printer's estimate of what it will cost to do this work and it turns out at the end of the next Congress that he made a mistake of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, what have you to do? You have got to pay it, and there is no escape.

Mr. President, no man is more in favor of economy and retrenchment than I am; but no man who knows the people knows better than the Senator who is the chairman of the Committee on Printing that the people never complain that the Government money shall be expended in having its work done well. They never sit down to calculate a few dollars when it is simply upon the subject of the execution of work. It is when you squander the public money; it is when you give large subsidies to corporations; when you engage in class legislation; when you vote enormous grants of land to corporations which do not meet their approval that the people speak out; but they believe in the doctrine that the laborer is worthy of his hire; and the people never find fault because a few thousand dollars in excess of what probably the same work might have been done for is expended, if the execution of the work is satisfactory to the people.

One word in conclusion. I admit that these gentlemen have been engaged, both their predecessors and themselves, for a long time in this service. That only makes them the more able to discharge with fidelity the duties imposed upon them; and while I am unwilling to pay any more than is reasonable and proper for their work, I do think that if their present bid is not accepted the power ought to be lodged with the joint Committee on Printing of both Houses to make a proper and a fair contract with these gentlemen, and not discharge them now and leave us on the 4th of March next with a hiatus in the reporting and publication of the debates. They submitted their proposal for six years. I would not give them a contract for six years. I propose to give it to them for two years, for the Forty-First Congress, and then, if during those two years it can be discovered that other, better, and more competent men can be employed as contractors or employed in your Government Printing Office to take charge of this work, it will be time enough to pass a resolution of the character proposed by the joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Maryland has enumerated various items of expenditure in the cost of publication, which he says are not included in the estimate of the Congressional Printer. This is a mistake. I suppose no estimate has been made of the rent of the building, but the items of wastage of paper, wear and tear of machinery, wear and tear of type, are included in the statement submitted by the Congressional Printer just as much as they are in the other bids. They are put in the general statement of cost. If we estimated all these items they would make a very long list.

The binding, folding, and gathering are estimated in the Congressional Printer's estimate at fifty-two cents. That seems very low, but it is the estimate of the foreman of the bindery, who is a very accomplished man in his business. He says he can do it for that, and he thinks he can do it for less than that. That is the price he puts down, and it is hardly proper for us, because it seems low, to say that we will give a man seventy eight cents for doing that which our own officer says he can do for fifty-two cents.

I have no doubt that the Congressional Printing Office can do this work as cheaply as it can be done by anybody, and that whatever money a contractor can make on it will be saved by the Government, subject, of course, to the deduction that must always be made for Government work in competition with private work. It always costs rather more. The eight-hour system, which has been imposed upon the Government Printing Office increases very much the cost of publication; but it equally increases the cost of publication at all private offices here, and these bidders have been obliged to take that into consideration in their estimates.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he states that the Congressional Printer himself made out these estimates?

Mr. ANTHONY. He revised them. I do not know that he made them out originally; probably not; but he revised and examined them, and they are all his estimates.

Mr. WHYTE. Then may I ask the Senator whether he could explain some of these estimates when he was asked?

Mr. ANTHONY. He explained them all according to my satisfaction.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator whether he could explain the estimate of Crowell in regard to indexing and folding one hundred and one signatures?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood that matter of folding and indexing one hundred and one signatures in this way: each index contains about twenty signatures, and the indexes are put in all the volumes. There are five volumes, and that makes a hundred signatures.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator will pardon me. I did not ask him what he understood; I asked him if the Congressional Printer could explain it until I made a suggestion to him.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not recollect. I know that we looked it all over together, and that was the conclusion we came to. At all events I think it is of very little consequence what are the items that make up these estimates. Here is the total at which Rives & Bailey say they will do it; here is the total at which Crowell says he will do it; and here is the total for which the Congressional Printer estimates that he can do it. However the items may vary we have the total estimate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Who is Mr. Crowell, and what establishment has he under his control at which this work can be done, and what connection, if any, has he heretofore had with the public printing?

Mr. ANTHONY. When a bidder comes to us with a proposal, as Mr. Crowell has come, certified to by men like the Appletons of New York, by men like the publishers of the New York Times, and by others not inferior in respectability, we do not go into his biography and past history. He offers to do this work, and they testify that he is a man abundantly able in capacity, in mechanical skill, and in professional ability to do it. I understand that he has been connected heretofore with the public printing, but I never saw him, and his name is not at all familiar to me; nor did I think it desirable to go behind such certificates as he adduced to us.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Are these certificates from gentlemen who propose to go on his bond?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose they give statements that he is a respectable gentleman?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no doubt in my judgment of his ability. These gentlemen testify to his ability to fulfill any work he may undertake in the way of printing and to his ability and integrity.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if he was not connected with the public printing when it was in the charge of Mr. Wendell?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know. I am told that he was at one time connected with the public printing, and it may have been under Mr. Wendell.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The reason the question suggested itself to my mind was, that when the change was made by which the printing was taken away from Mr. Wendell by a change of the law, I opposed the proposition, and made some remarks to the Senate about it; and then it happened that on the same morning Mr. Wendell and Mr. Defrees both came to me and urged me to withdraw my opposition, as I stated that day in the Senate, and I wanted to know whether this gentleman was connected with the public printing at that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. He cannot have been connected with the public printing since it has been done at the Government office, unless in some subordinate capacity, which I suppose he would not have been likely to take. Ever since the Senator from Indiana has been in this body the public printing has been done at the Government office by the Superintendent of Public Printing, or the Congressional Printer. Of course Mr. Crowell could have had no connection with him except as one of his subordinates, and I never knew that he was one, and I supposed he was a man of larger capacity and business than would be likely to take such a place. I could ascertain the fact, however, if it be deemed desirable to be known. I think Mr. Crowell was connected with the public printing before my day in some capacity, as contractor, or printer of blanks; but I do not know that. All I know of him is the testimonials he presents, and those are perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I have only a word to say, and it is in corroboration of what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Printing. I think as guardians of the public interest it is our duty to save $60,000, as we can do by giving this work to the Government Printing Office. One reason why they can do the work there cheaper is that they have all the management paid for; they have the building, they have the types, presses, bindery, &c., paid for.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he states that they can do this work in the present building?

Mr. CAMERON. I did not say that. They have asked for an appropriation of $22,000, as I understand, to increase the building which is necessary now for the present work they do. When that appropriation is made and the building extended they will have room enough for the publication of the Globe. There is no mistake about this. That clear-headed old gentleman over there in the corner [pointing to a reporter] does the reporting, which gives all the credit to the Congressional Globe that it has, and he does it for the pay of a subordinate. The gentlemen who have had the contract have several families to support; they have the proprietors of the establishment, they have their clerks and foremen, and their buildings, and their type, presses, &c., to put into the cost; and therefore of course they will require a larger sum to make a profit than the work can be done for at the Government Printing Office.

Besides, the estimate that the Senator from Maryland makes about the binding is to my mind very clear. On the one side, the Globe proprietors ask seventy-eight cents a volume for binding; the Congressional Printer estimates its cost at fifty-two cents. There is twenty-six cents profit. That is a profit which has enabled these gentlemen, a number of them, to make the large fortunes they have. I do not complain about it.

Mr. WHYTE. My proposition excludes the binding, leaving that to be done as it is now, by the Government.

Mr. CAMERON. Why should not the whole work be done by the Government Printing Office as well as the binding? I do not know anything about the gentleman who puts in the bid that is said to be lower than any other. I have always been in favor of letting our printing be done by contract. A long while ago I obtained the passage of the bill here giving it to the lowest bidder, and we got the work very well done, and we saved more than half the price which had been paid before that on the same amount of work. But now we have a Government Printing Office here; we have to support it, and we may as well compel it to do as much work as it is capable of doing.

I know how difficult it is to change a contract of this kind. The Senator from Maryland says let us make a contract for two years and try it. We have been making these experiments for fifteen years. It will be just as difficult to settle this matter in two years as it is now. Now, by ending the present arrangement we do no harm to the contractors; they have had abundant profits; they are rich; they have made more money than they need, a great deal more than they need, out of this contract. Let us now try some other experiment, and if the Public Printer does not do it cheaper for us, then we can give it to the lowest bidder or adopt some other plan.

As to the hiatus the Senator talks of in the reporting, nothing of that kind will occur. We can in five minutes pass a resolution that the same corps of reporters who are here now shall continue to report our debates. Their manuscript will not spoil; their notes and the copyings of these notes will be here, and in a very few days a printing office can be in condition to put them in type. It is just a question to my mind whether we shall save a certain sum, $60,000 a year, and I believe it will be double that next year, or whether we shall throw that money away.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand the difference between the estimate made of what it will cost the Government and the contract is not $60,000 a year, but only $40,000. I think that that margin is not enough to compensate the Government for the risk it runs—that the estimate is not accurate.

Mr. CAMERON. Forty thousand dollars is a good deal of money to save in a year. I do not know how it is in New Jersey; but it is so regarded in my State.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am told the whole cost is $150,000 a year. We are told this change will be a saving of $40,000; but how is that estimate made? That estimate is made not by a person who is going to take the contract and who is unaffected entirely by the question whether his estimate is correct or incorrect, and I have not a great deal of confidence in it. Besides, I believe it is the true interest of the Government to make as few contracts, to undertake as few jobs, whether in printing or in building railroads or canals or anything of that character, as possible; but to make contracts with individuals and make them strictly and have them rigidly enforced.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I believe that we have got one or two or three printing offices at the Treasury Department and other places, and that they have resulted disastrously so far as economy is concerned. If this change should be made I have no idea but that instead of making $40,000 for every two years of congressional printing we should run under at least $60,000 a year. It is not to be expected, in the first place, that this printing can be done without a building equal in extent and capacity to the buildings now occupied for the purpose of pursuing this business by the Globe office; and we are either to rent such buildings or to make appropriations for their construction hereafter, and we are to employ a large additional force. The present amount of business that is under the control of the Superintendent of Printing is enough for the ambition of any one man without adding anything more to it. We give him all of our congressional printing and we give him that of the internal revenue department, and we have recently thrown upon him the purchasing of all the stationery used in any branch of the Government, as I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. That has only passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It has passed the House at any rate. Now, Mr. President, the parties who have been engaged in this business are enterprising men. It is shown by the very proposals they have made here, when they are made with the expectation of any amount of competition, that they cannot do the work for such sums as have been paid to them heretofore. That shows at least that their profits heretofore have not been extravagant, have not been more than the same amount of capital and the same amount of business tact and energy ought to have made.

I do not believe that we are on the road to retrenchment by making this change; but I believe that if it should be made we should revert and turn back to the same system within four years. I trust that we shall allow the Committee on Public Printing to make a contract with the present proprietors of the Globe.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I gave notice yesterday that to-day at one o'clock I should ask the Senate to consider the Army appropriation bill. If this is likely to occupy more time I shall feel called upon to interpose; but if no more discussion is to take place I shall not make the motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know how long it will occupy, but I think it will occupy less time now than at any future day. I think we ought to dispose of it before we adjourn. I have no more interest in it than any other Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am appealed to on both sides to allow this matter to go on for a few moments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Rhode Island if the contract with the Globe expires on the 4th of March as the law at present stands.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does. The contract expires; and if the Government had not given notice to the contractors of the termination of the contract the contractors themselves would have given notice to the Government. The profit which they have derived from printing the Congressional Globe has been derived from furnishing back sets to new members of Congress. That amounted for the Thirty-Ninth Congress to $49,000; and as they are printed from stereotype plates it is fair to suppose that from one half to two thirds is profit. They say that Congress now having cut off that source of profit it will be impossible for them to go on with their work at the present prices.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not insist on my motion at present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2004) establishing the term of office of the House of Representatives and providing for biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana;

A bill (H. R. No. 2005) declaring the lands constituting the Fort Collins military reservation in the Territory of Colorado subject to preemption and homestead entry as provided for in existing laws; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1864) for the repeal of tonnage duties on Spanish vessels; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. GRIMES, Mr. HENDRICKS, and Mr. NYE.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2005) declaring the lands constituting the Fort Collins military reservation in the Territory of Colorado subject to preemption and homestead entry as provided for in existing laws was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MONTANA TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

Mr. COLE rose.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator give way one moment? The bill for biennial sessions of the Legislature of the Territory of Montana provides simply that the citizens of Montana Territory may elect their legislators for two years in compliance with the now existing law. It is a question we have had before our committee, and it is very well understood; and it is necessary to pass the bill for the purpose of complying with the enabling act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill may be taken up at this time if there be no objection.

Mr. COLE. I do not know how long it may take. I rose to call up the unfinished business of last night, which I suppose takes precedence of all other business.

Mr. NYE. It will not occupy a moment.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2004) establishing the term of office of the House of Representatives and providing for biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana was read three times and passed. It provides that hereafter the members of the House of Representatives of the Territory of Montana shall be elected for the term of two years; that the sessions of the Legislative Assembly shall be biennial, and that the Legislative Assembly at its first session after the passage of the act shall provide by law for carrying its provisions into effect.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. COLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is Senate bill No. 247, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the greater security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," and for other purposes. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say one word. If this is to occupy time I think I ought to ask for a postponement; if not, and the friends of the bill think it can pass without debate, I have no objection to a vote being taken upon it. If it is to occupy time, I think I ought to ask for its postponement, and to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. CORBETT. I think it will take but a few minutes to pass this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] which will be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is my joint resolution displaced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is superseded by the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought the unfinished business was laid aside to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It overran the time, and the Chair did not call up the unfinished business until attention was called to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The matter we were engaged upon is almost in the nature of a privileged question; but I do not mean to press it as such. I have the same interest in it that all other Senators have.

Mr. MORTON. As we are informed that the Globe contract terminates on the 4th of March it seems to me to be imperative on Congress to take some action one way or the other, or we shall after that time find ourselves without reporters and printers. We ought to determine one way or the other about the thing now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to postpone the bill that has been called up as unfinished business for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the joint resolution which was pending during the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] which will be read.

Mr. WHYTE. Before my amendment is read I should like to refer the Senate to page 5 of the Congressional Printer's last annual report. There the Senate will see the immense amount of unfinished work he has already on his hands, and they can then determine whether it had better be added to or diminished.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make a suggestion to my friend from Maryland. The amendment directs the joint Committee on Printing to contract with Rives & Bailey according to their proposition. Now, it seems to me that if we are to contract with Rives & Bailey their proposal is so much higher than the estimate of the Congressional Printer, and so much higher than the bid we have received from a person who brings to us abundant evidence of his capability to perform the work, that the price ought to be left blank. I should not desire myself, unless under the specific instructions of Congress, to contract at the price named in their proposal.

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection to such a modification if the committee desire it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland whether it would not be better to put in "if they can make a contract satisfactory to the committee."

Mr. WHYTE. I am perfectly content.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Put it in that shape.

Mr. WHYTE. I will strike out the words "according to their proposition."

Mr. FESSENDEN. We may get it cheaper. As it stands now, the question is whether we should gain or lose by it. My opinion is that we should only lose by attempting to do it, because I think it is overburdening the Public Printer, and I think those men have done the work so well and so long that their judgment as to what they can do it for, as they certainly must be very desirous of getting the contract, is a good deal better than the judgment of anybody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. If in the opinion of the Senate the printing of the Globe should be done by private persons, and not by the Public Printer, I would much prefer to leave the whole matter of making a contract to the Committee on Printing. Certainly I would not require them to make a contract with any particular person, but would give them the most unlimited power to make such a contract as in their judgment would secure the purpose of the law—a full report of the debates of Congress. My own opinion is, and has been for two or three years, that since we have already established a Bureau of Printing, if I may say so, a great printing establishment, this additional work of printing the proceedings of Congress may be added to that establishment without very much enlarging it or very much changing it. The publication of our debates, although very voluminous, is but little in comparison with the vast work that the Government Printing Office is now doing, and doing well, and doing cheaper than it was done before. There is no doubt about the comparison of the figures of the cost of printing now and the cost of printing before the war; taking into consideration the advance in the price of materials, we save largely on the work done by the Congressional Printer. The whole establishment has been a success so far as I know.

My friend from Vermont awhile ago alluded to the printing of the Treasury Department. I can show by statistics that the cost of doing what has been done in the Treasury Department by the private corporations in New York who used to print our bank bills would have been twice or three times as great as what it has been in the Treasury. My friend from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] can testify better as to that, but the fact is that the cost of printing in the Treasury Department has been greatly under that which would have been paid to private companies.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not deny that for a specific job the work has been done cheaper at the Treasury Department, but I insist that it has brought with it a large amount of unnecessary printing that has been done in the Treasury Department, and which involves the Government in a vast increase of expense.

Mr. SHERMAN. While I am on my feet I will state that I concur substantially in the view of the Committee on Printing, that this work being a Government work had better be done and controlled like all the other Government printing in the Government Printing Office. I would not establish a Government Printing Office for the purpose of printing the debates of Congress, but since we have such an establishment, and since this will be only a comparatively small addition to the labor, I think it ought to be done there. The Government Printing Office now binds the Globe; it has to buy the paper for that purpose; it now does all the kinds of work that would be done if it was compelled to print the Congressional Globe, except to provide for the reporting. The reporting is done by a corps of experienced gentlemen, who, I suppose, cannot be improved in the United States. No doubt they will be retained. Probably no better or more experienced persons for that business could be employed anywhere. They will undoubtedly be kept. The only change will be that their manuscript, instead of being sent to the office of Rives & Bailey, will be sent to the Government Printing Office. Now the sheets that come from the press of Rives & Bailey are sent to the Government Printing Office to be bound, so that all the additional work that will have to be done in the Government Printing Office is to put up the types and stereotype them and print these sheets. It seems to me that if by this process we can save fifty or sixty thousand dollars we ought to do it, even upon the narrow ground of economy; but I believe on other grounds it is better to have this whole matter done under Government supervision in the Government Printing Office. I shall therefore vote for the resolution of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It appears to me that this resolution, with the amendment as now presented, is unobjectionable. According to the resolution as amended the Committee on Printing is required to make a contract with Bailey & Rives for the publication of the Globe, and there are no terms prescribed. They are not required to contract according to the proposition made by Rives & Bailey, but they are left to their discretion to make as good a contract as they can with these persons. If they do not succeed in making a satisfactory contract with these persons, then the resolution provides that the printing may be done at the Public Printing Office. Can the resolution be put in any better shape than that? It seems to me that that is all that Congress can require. Let the committee proceed. It is possible, after this discussion and after further consultation with these gentlemen, that they will prefer to take this printing at a reduced price rather than to have it transferred to the Government Printing Office. If they do not consent to do that, then let the committee, according to the second section, take the printing and put it at the Government Printing Office, and have it conducted there under their supervision. It seems to me that this is the best shape in which the proposition can be put. I hope we shall pass it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we ought to take the sense of the Senate in regard to the question whether we shall transfer this work to the Government printing establishment or not. I am for that.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is precisely what the committee wish, some indication of the disposition of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I was going to say that if the Senate decline to make the transfer, then I want the committee to make as good a contract as they can, but let the question first be determined whether we will transfer it. I am for that. I do not see why we want to run two establishments. If we run one printing establishment why should not it do the whole work?

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to get at a result without wasting much time, I will submit a motion that will bring it to a direct vote. I move, as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, a simple proposition that the printing of the Congressional Globe shall, after the 4th of March next, be done at the Government Printing Office. That will bring a direct vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is an amendment to that very proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I offer it as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then you offer the original proposition as an amendment to an amendment to that proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. We shall get a vote in that way.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. Let us get a vote on something.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Unless in the proposition the Congressional Printing Office is permitted to make sales of the daily issues of the Globe and of the quarto volumes after they are printed they cannot in any way print as cheaply as the present contractors. Can the Government Printing Office sell its publications to the public?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. There is a general law that allows any document ordered by Congress to be sold, the price of it being paid before it is printed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Here is a public and enterprising company that sell during the session the issue of the Globe for ten dollars. It costs between six and seven dollars to the Government for the copies furnished Congress. They sell copies during the session of Congress, as they are issued daily, for ten dollars a copy. Then, for the five volumes that are published by Congress they get thirty dollars. The price that they get outside will enable them to compete successfully against the Congressional Printing Office or anybody else. That is as I understand it, and as I have been informed is the condition in which this printing business is.

Mr. ANTHONY. They undoubtedly have an advantage on the private subscriptions to the Globe.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It will enable them to print at a much less rate. The correct way, in my judgment, to manage this business is to authorize the Printing Committee to make a contract for doing it either with contractors or with the Government Printing Office, and give them a discretion in the matter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, nothing is more deceptive than public estimates; we know that in the great body of the work that is done for the Government, the construction of public buildings and repairs and all that. Now, sir, I have very little confidence in the estimates that are presented here from the bureau of public printing, if it may be so called. I do not believe that this printing will be done at the Public Printing Office for the price that we are paying to the present company. I do not expect it to be done for that price. I know that the Government never does work as cheap as individuals do it. Ordinarily we can pay individuals for work done and a reasonable profit, and save money to the Government, rather than do it directly through the agents of the Government. This work has been carried on a long while by this office to the satisfaction of members of Congress. It reflects credit upon the Government, and I am very reluctant to see a change made. In the course of a Congress I believe it is now claimed that there can be a change made in favor of the Treasury of forty or fifty or sixty thousand dollars. When we come to test it by experience I think that the change will be the other way; it will cost that much more than it does now.

But, sir, as we have the work done to the entire satisfaction of Congress now I would not risk a change for the possibility of saving that amount. While I do not believe we shall save it—on the contrary I believe it will be more expensive—I would not make the change for that small sum. It is a valuable work. It contains the history of Congress. It is done now by responsible parties. They are responsible to their profession as well as to Congress and to the people for the style in which the work is done. I should regret to see a change made. It is very clear that the work ought not to be given to this other competitor for it. There is no prospect that it will be done as we should desire. And as between the Public Printing Office and the Globe office I prefer leaving it where it is.

I have an old attachment perhaps to this office that influences my judgment somewhat. I knew it when it was carried on by Mr. John C. Rives. I had a great respect for him, and do not regret that he made a reasonable profit on the work that he always conducted according to his contract and continued with honor until he made it one of the creditable works in connection with the public service. I do not regret that he made some profit upon it. The fact referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he amassed a respectable sum of money is not a reason for taking it away. We expect men when they do work to make some profit, and if the profits are uniform and reasonable in the course of a long series of years they will amount to a respectable sum. I do not understand that the fortune is a very great one, not as much perhaps as has been made by many gentlemen in their ordinary private pursuits, but a respectable fortune as I understand, though what it is I am not prepared to say. That is not a reason for taking work away unless it appears that the price paid is an unreasonable one. If an unreasonable one, then the correction ought to be made, of course. I do not understand that the present price is an unreasonable one, and therefore I shall vote to leave this work where it is. I believe it is to the advantage of the Government to leave it there.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, I look upon this something in the light of an old faithful bookkeeper or friend that has been in your employment for a great many years. If I had a bookkeeper that was in my employment, and had been for twenty or thirty years, that had always been faithful, who had done his business to my satisfaction, always been trusty, and I had found him in every way worthy, I should feel myself bound to continue him in that position as long as he behaved himself in such a manner as to command my confidence and approbation. This business, as I understand, has been conducted to the satisfaction of Congress; and for the sum of $20,000 a year to change this printing to a source which perhaps may not be so satisfactory to every gentleman in Congress seems to me very unwise.

The work is now done to the satisfaction of every one of the Senators here present, I have no doubt. The courtesy extended by this printing establishment has been uniform to every member of Congress; and we have no complaint. The price it seems to me is not above perhaps what should be reasonable as a profit over and above the cost of the printing of this work. The estimate is that the actual cost will be something like $20,000 a year less to the Government than it would be under the auspices of this private company. That is not more than a reasonable amount of profit for these individuals; and these people pay their taxes and contribute to the support of the Government as does every other business. It seems to me it would be unwise to change this printing at this time. I shall vote for keeping it where it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the amendment be read as modified by the mover.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert: That the Joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing is hereby authorized to contract, on behalf of the General Government, with Rives & Bailey for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress for the term of two years on and from the 4th day of March, 1869: Provided, That before the United States shall be called on to pay for any reporting or publication of the debates, the accounts therefor shall be submitted to the Joint Committee on Public Printing, or to such other officer or officers of Congress as they may designate, and on their or his approbation thereof as being in all respects according to the contract, it shall be paid for from the Treasury of the United States, after having passed the proper accounting officers thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That in case the Joint Committee on Public Printing are unable to conclude a contract with the said Rives & Bailey, or that they be unable to fulfill any contract that they may make, the Joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to have the debates reported and printed under the direction of the Congressional Printer at the Government Printing Office.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose aforesaid there be appropriated and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MORTON. I have no faith myself in the Government directly procuring heavy work of this kind to be performed cheaper through its own immediate agents than by contract. It is contrary to all governmental experience. Wherever the Government has work to be done of a continuous or important character it has uniformly been found to be cheaper to let it out, under fair terms of contract, than to undertake to execute the work itself.

If the Government has a harbor to repair or construct, or any public work to do, it has been found cheaper by experience to let it out by contract than for the Government to undertake, through its own agents, to hire the hands and execute the work. The Government tried that experiment once in the construction of the Cumberland road. The construction of that road was first put under the care of engineers, with authority to employ superintendents and agents, to hire the hands and construct the road, without the intervention of contractors; and I believe it is a notorious fact that the work cost the Government at least twice what it would have cost if it had been let out under fair terms of contract; and more than that, it progressed far more slowly than it would have done if it had been fairly contracted for.

Why, sir, the operation of this principle is so well understood that railroad companies, private corporations, where they have a railroad to construct, will not undertake to construct it directly by their own agents. Some roads have attempted that; but they have been, I believe, uniformly unfortunate. I remember one instance where a railroad company undertook to build a road through its own superintendents, to employ hands, and superintend them; and after having partially constructed the road it was compelled to abandon that system and resort to the ordinary one of contract, where the work is let out to contractors under fair competition.

Now, sir, if the Government of the United States can save money by undertaking to execute a long and heavy work of this kind, directly through its own agents, I undertake to say it will be the first time that that experiment has ever been successful. As I said before, it has been tried in regard to railroad companies, where the parties managing the company were directly parties in interest; and it has been found, even with regard to railroad companies, that it is to their advantage to let the work out to contractors and allow the contractors to make fair profits, and that they can construct the work cheaper and faster.

As this is the almost universal experience with regard to the Government in other particulars, with regard to corporations, with regard to the construction of all works of improvement, it seems to me there is no reason to suppose that the Government can execute this particular work cheaper through its own agents than it can by contractors, with fair competition. What I should like to see—I do not know whether it is possible now or not—would be that this work should be thrown open to fair competition to the lowest bidder. I am of the opinion that if this thing was properly published, and if there was time for it, there are heavy printing establishments in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, where they have ample material, where they have entire experience and an abundance of presses and type, and all the necessary machinery that could set up a branch establishment here and could do this work perhaps cheaper than is either offered by Mr. Crowell or by the Globe company. But, sir, that the Government will save anything, as even compared with the bid of the Globe company, by undertaking to do it itself, I entertain the gravest doubts.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will notice that there is a second joint resolution reported from the Committee on Printing, under the instructions of the act, which does give this contract to the lowest bidder. It was not exactly in the nature of a bid, because we were not authorized to receive a bid, but only proposals, and to report them to Congress, and we have reported the lowest proposal we received, and another joint resolution gives the contract to the party making that proposal.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that; and I have no doubt the committee have done all in their power to present this subject to Congress in the best possible manner. But, sir, if the Government can save money by doing this work itself rather than having it done by contractors it is an exception to every other kind of work that the Government has to perform. It is an exception to the almost universal experience so far as the Government and the States are concerned, and even private corporations.

Mr. GRIMES. The first thing to be done will be to build a new printing-house.

Mr. ANTHONY. That we have got to do anyhow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I think we carry our notions of economy to a very considerable excess without stopping to consider what may be the result finally. There are two propositions before the Senate. One is to give this work to the lowest bidder. Let us look a little at the nature of it. It is not simply a matter of printing and binding; it is a matter of reporting; it is a matter of getting up the material, stating properly, succinctly, and accurately what we do here. That is a part of the contract. These men who are to furnish the reports of the debates employ the reporters; they are responsible for the accuracy of the reports; they are responsible for the accuracy of the work that is done. It is a matter of skill, a matter of experience, a matter of judgment. If we have this work done at the Government Printing Office, although I have as much confidence in the Superintendent of Public Printing as any man can have, and believe he does his work well, faithfully, and carefully, yet, after all, he is but a Government agent, and there is no personal responsibility on him. He makes no contract. He will do it as well as he can; but how is he situated? I understand from the chairman of the committee that the Superintendent has no desire to do this work. He does not want to increase his own labors. He says he can do it if Congress requires it; that it can be done at the Government Printing Office; but it is tacking an additional burden upon what already is heavy enough for any one man; and he, after he takes it, would be a mere agent of the Government, and he would be no more responsible in one sense of the word for the accuracy of it by any contract he would make, pecuniarily, than we should ourselves.

Now, sir, it is an old adage, and one that is well worth thinking of, that it is best to let well enough alone. We all know that this reporting has been exceedingly well done. It is done well, not only on the part of the reporters themselves, with whom we have every reason to be abundantly satisfied in every particular, but it has been done well on the part of the contractors who are responsible for the execution of the work.

It is said that they have got rich. I do not know how that may be; I know nothing about their fortunes; but I know that Mr. Rives was repeatedly before Congress and demonstrated to the satisfaction of Congress that he could not do this work unless he was allowed certain sums and certain privileges. That he made himself comfortable in his fortune is very true; and I agree with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] that he deserved to make himself comfortable and to make a reasonable sum of money and to be independent.

Now, sir, experience is everything. In that building, having all the necessary material to carry on this work, has been the experience of years, and a most satisfactory experience. Suppose we let this out to the lowest bidder. As has been said here, he has not a printing office; he has got to begin on the 4th of March; he has not a printing office here; he has no materials ready; everything is to be prepared. How shall we be situated until he gets well under way and gets the thing going? We shall have innumerable complaints and innumerable errors. It is in the nature of things that it should be so. Instead of going on with old experienced hands who are already accustomed to the work—and it needs practice and experience—we have new hands. I take it that nobody thinks seriously of making a contract on such terms unless we can be satisfied that the work shall go along correctly.

Then the only question that presents itself is, shall we save so much money? If we can save it as well as not and do this work I should be very glad to save it; but it is the merest experiment in the world. No man's judgment is infallible. The idea that the Public Printer, with all the labor that he has upon his hands, the vast amount of work he has to perform, can take this work at once under his control and do it as well as those who have had it for their only work to be accomplished is to my mind perfectly incomprehensible. I do not see how any gentleman should think it possible. I care not who has this work so that it is well done.

I am among those who believe that in these times the reporting of the proceedings of Congress has become a necessity. It is a necessity to the public and it is a necessity to the members of Congress themselves. It is satisfactory to the community. They want to know what is being done, and they want to know with some degree of accuracy what is being done. The idea suggested by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. McKen] that we can let it out to printers in New York, Boston, &c., does not strike my mind as at all feasible, that we can accomplish anything by it. I do not believe that the lowest bidder is one half the time the cheapest bidder for the person with whom he contracts.

Now, sir, the matter can be easily understood. The Committee on Printing are practical men. My friend who stands at the head of it [Mr. ANTHONY] is certainly acquainted with his business. I am perfectly willing to pay the present publishers a fair and reasonable profit, and with this competition before them they cannot get any more than a fair and reasonable profit. Then, what is this proposition? Bear in mind that the idea of change, and change at once, includes all the risks of change; the risks with regard to accuracy in the first place; the risks with regard to promptitude; the risks with regard to final expenditure, final cheapness, and real economy. That has got to be an experiment. We only have an opinion to begin with. Then, what is the objection to this proposition? I am in favor of letting well enough alone if we can afford to do so. I am in favor of letting this work be done as it has been done, by the same men, if they will do it on reasonable terms, such as we ought to accept: because, being satisfied with the mode in which they have done it, I feel more safety while in their hands if they continue to do it.

Therefore I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, because it puts it into the hands of the committee to make a contract with those who have performed their contracts well hitherto and whom we know by experience to be prompt and capable of doing all this work, if you can make a contract with them on satisfactory terms, such you ought to make. If you cannot do it, then you have the Congressional Printer at hand, and then from necessity will be obliged to take the risk of that experiment. I shall be willing to take it under those circumstances, and I would rather take it now than contract with any new men; but I should prefer to go on as we have been going on if we can be satisfied that in so doing we are really advancing or not injuring the interests of the Government in relation to that particular matter.

I am not in favor of leaving ourselves in the power of any set of men who can make their own terms for work; and I make this remark with reference to what fell from my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in regard to the printing at the Treasury. I have no doubt, from my knowledge of affairs there, that millions have been saved to this Government by the fact that the Treasury took into its own hands, under the direction of Secretary Chase, the printing of the notes, bonds, &c. Prior to that time we were in the hands of men who could make their own terms, and did make their own terms, and it was an absolute necessity to be independent of them. I believe if any experiment in the world has been a success that experiment has been a success, and a very great success; and all the investigations that have been had with reference to the conduct of it, so far as I know, have resulted in nothing but the discovery of some irregularities in keeping the accounts, but in no discovery of any serious wrong or any serious loss. I know that when I first went into the Treasury Department I felt exceedingly troubled about it, and I watched it with exceeding care. The thought that troubled me when I went to my pillow at night was the fear that something or other would happen with regard to the printing of notes and bonds in the Treasury Department that would involve me in responsibility as the head of it. But, sir, I believe, with all the scrutiny and all the examination and everything that has been done to find out what the result of it has been, the conclusion to be arrived at must necessarily be that it has been a remarkable success in itself, and free from any very particular injury or loss to the Government in any way, nothing to be compared with what has been stated. I say this simply with reference to that remark made by the Senator from Vermont, in order that I might express my opinion publicly on this subject so far as my knowledge of it extends.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Whenever the Government have had anything to sell as a general thing the result has been that they have had to sell it at a much less price than it was worth. Take the sales at the close of the war of all the Army and Navy material, and you find that the combinations that have been made against the Government in the purchase of all those materials have been to the Government's disadvantage. Contracts for the doing of any work of the Government are of the same character, in my judgment, and contractors for printing outside can as readily be bought off and the contract obtained at a higher price unless proper restrictions and proper guards are placed around it so that the contracting party or the Government may have some leverage against these combinations. Now, then, it strikes me that the Committee on Printing are the proper power or persons to execute these contracts; and it is also proper, in my judgment, that in addition to that power being conferred upon them they should be able to use the Government Printing Office as a part of the power or privilege or advantage which they would have in making the contract. For myself I do not believe that it is possible for the Government Printing Office to print the debates as cheaply or as well as those who have been accustomed for so long a time to do it; but I believe that having that office at their disposal the committee would be able to contract to much better advantage for the Government than they would otherwise be able to do. As I have said, the compensation that the contractors now have is in the sale of the books otherwise made than to Congress, by which they are enabled to contract at a low price, and that part can be pushed to a greater extent than it is now. With wise attention given to it by the Committee on Printing the printing of the Congressional Globe can be obtained from the present contractors to better advantage, in my judgment, than it can in any other way. I would have the discretion left with the Committee on Printing to use the Government office in the event that they could not obtain satisfactory prices out of the present contractors or others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask my friend from Maryland to modify his amendment. It directs the committee to contract with Rives & Bailey according to their proposals.

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir; I have modified it in that particular.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it read now just as it stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. The joint resolution, as amended, reads as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That the joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing is hereby authorized to contract on behalf of the General Government with Rives & Bailey for the reporting and publication of the debates of Congress for the term of two years on and from the 4th day of March, 1869: Provided, That before Congress shall be called on to pay for any reporting or publication of the debates the accounts therefor shall be submitted to the joint Committee on Public Printing or to such other officer or officers of Congress as they may designate, and on their or his approbation thereof, as being in all respects according to the contract, it shall be paid for from the Treasury of the United States, after having passed the proper accounting officers thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That in case the joint Committee on Public Printing are unable to conclude a contract with the said Rives & Bailey, or that they be unable to fulfill any contract they may make, the joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to have the debates reported and printed under the direction of the Congressional Printer at the Government Printing Office.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose aforesaid there be appropriated and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to insert the word "satisfactory" before "contract," because I wish to leave the committee some discretion. They undoubtedly can make a contract with Rives & Bailey; but I wish to make the matter discretionary with them to make a satisfactory contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for a division on that amendment. There was no division before. I do not wish to continue the discussion.

The amendment was concurred in, there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 11.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. COLE. I suppose that will displace indefinitely the unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to laying that aside informally by general consent.

Mr. COLE. I have no objection to that if it will come up immediately after this bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to lay this bill aside informally. If there be no objection that course will be taken, and the bill (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the greater security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," and for other purposes, is before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I moved to take up the Army appropriation bill. My remark was, in reply to the Senator from California, that I had no objection that his bill should go by informally while we considered the Army bill. Otherwise I make the motion to take up that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California wanted to get up his navigation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Was his bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There being nothing before the Senate I move to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) If it is the pleasure of the Senate the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached during the reading of the bill. No objection being made, that will be considered as the sense of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line eight, to strike out the words "one hundred and" before "fifty;" so that the clause will read:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventeen, to reduce the appropriation "for payments to discharged soldiers for clothing not drawn" from $500,000 to $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to. The next amendment was in line twenty, to increase from $60,000 to $100,000 the appropriation "for contingencies of the Army."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line twenty-four the following:

For the purchase of artificial limbs for officers, soldiers, and sailors, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line forty-eight, to strike out "three" and insert "five," so as to make the appropriation for the regular supplies of the quartermaster's department $5,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty, in the clause making an appropriation for the general and incidental expenses of the quartermaster's department, to strike out the words "general and" before "incidental."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighty-eight, to insert the words "the purchase of;" so that the clause will read:

For the purchase of horses for cavalry and artillery, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and eighteen, to strike out "five" and insert "eight;" so as to make the appropriation for the transportation of the Army $8,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and twenty-five, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the commanding officer of the post where any land of the United States is occupied by any civilian for a private purpose, is required to charge rent for the same; the amount of which rent shall be ascertained by advertising for proposals before the 1st day of July in each year in at least one paper in the State or Territory in which the land lies, and the same shall be let to the highest bidder therefor, for the year next ensuing, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, provided said land shall be vacated by the tenant, on notice, when the exigencies of the service may require, without any claim for damages for removal: And provided further, That the Quartermaster General shall be authorized, in like manner, to lease any lands or buildings of the United States under the charge of the War Department, during the time in which the same are not needed for the use of the Government, and the proceeds thereof shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and fifty-three, to strike out the words "pay for" and to insert the word "purchase."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the military force is reduced to twenty regiments of infantry, five regiments of cavalry, and five regiments of artillery, no new commission shall be issued in any regiment; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to consolidate regiments as rapidly as the requirements of the public service and the reduction in the number of officers will permit until the aforementioned minimum is reached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations have now been gone through with.

Mr. WILSON. I offer an amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs, to insert in lieu of the second section, which has been stricken out, the following additional sections:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized and directed to reduce the Army of the United States as rapidly as the interests of the public service will permit, in the manner and to the extent hereinafter specified: the number of infantry regiments shall be reduced to thirty by consolidation, and no more enlistments shall be made into the infantry or artillery until the number of enlisted men in each regiment falls below the minimum number prescribed by law, and thereafter the number of enlisted men shall not exceed the minimum. No appointments of brigadier generals shall be made until the number be reduced to less than eight; and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals in the Army.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the term of enlistment shall be five years.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all officers rendered supernumerary by the provisions of this act shall be assigned to vacancies which may occur in their respective grades, and no appointments other than graduates of the Military Academy shall be made to fill vacancies in any grade until all such supernumerary officers of that grade shall have been so assigned.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That of the fifteen bands now in the service, organized under the provisions of section seven of an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, all except the band at the Military Academy shall be honorably discharged without delay, and shall receive full pay and allowance to the date of such discharge: Provided, That there shall be enlisted in each regiment a chief musician, who shall be instructor of music, with a salary of sixty dollars a month and the allowances of a quartermaster sergeant.

I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know that I rise to object.

Mr. GRIMES. This amendment is to take the place of the second section, which has been stricken out. I think the third section ought to be stricken out also.

Mr. WILSON. It will not do any harm to let that stand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say one word, not in the way of objection. The estimates for the expenditures for the Army for this year were about fifty-six million dollars. The Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives proposed a reduction to $42,000,000. That was based upon the assumption of the probable reduction of the Army by natural causes. The bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives appropriated a fraction over $29,000,000; but that reduction seems to have been made during the progress of the bill upon the probability that the House of Representatives was to adopt some measure by which the Army should be reduced some twenty-five thousand men, rank and file; but when the bill came to be concluded the House failed to adopt the proposition which reduced the Army in that way. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, looking at this state of facts, have increased the appropriations to about thirty-four million dollars, I think. I ought to say that that reduction is upon the assumption that the Army from natural causes or by the future action of Congress will be greatly reduced. It is only upon that assumption that this sum is deemed adequate. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs interposes to provide for that reduction. I do not rise to object to it, but simply to say that if it has been matured by the Committee on Military Affairs and they deem it advisable I do not object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to strike out in the third section, lines four and five, the words "in the ordnance department, in the engineer department;" so that the section will read:

That until otherwise directed by law there shall be no new appointments and no promotions in the Adjutant General's department, in the Inspector General's department, in the pay department, in the quartermaster's department, in the commissary department, and in the medical department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to add at the end of the first section the following amendment:

For continuing and concluding the field work of the expedition and survey of the fortieth parallel, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to have prepared and published the report of the results of the exploring expedition and survey of the line of the fortieth parallel: Provided, That the cost of the same shall be defrayed out of existing appropriations in the War Department: And provided further, That the letterpress work shall be done at the Public Printing Office.

I hold in my hand a report made by the chief of engineers, indorsed by the Secretary of War and recommended by the General-in-Chief of the Army, asking for $200,000 for the purpose of military surveys in the country. The Committee on Military Affairs thought, as this report came here so late, that we had better not move an amendment covering that large amount of money; but as this work is under way the committee report an appropriation of $50,000 instead of $200,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who is doing it?

Mr. WILSON. The engineer department.
Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what practical benefit this survey of the fortieth parallel is to be.

Mr. WILSON. It is a military survey of the fortieth parallel.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it for? Is it to find a place to build a fort, or to find a place for a railroad or a plank-road or a wooden road?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand the object of a survey of that parallel, and I should like the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to explain it.

Mr. WILSON. I will not press this amendment if there is any doubt or question about it; but I have here a report of General Humphreys, chief of engineers, stating that a certain appropriation for surveys had been stricken out of the river and harbor bill and recommending an appropriation of $200,000 for military surveys. The Secretary of War sends it here and indorses it thus:

"The sum asked for is for military surveys, estimated in the annual estimates of the engineer's department of the Army for the next fiscal year, to be transferred from the river and harbor appropriation bill, in which it has been put by Congress, to the Army appropriation bill."

The river and harbor bill, which contained that appropriation, will probably not pass at this session. The General-in-Chief of the Army sent a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives recommending this action to Congress and sustaining the report of General Humphreys and the Secretary of War. The committee thought the sum of $200,000 was a large sum to put on the bill for military surveys, but they thought it well to finish the work already begun on the fortieth parallel, and they report this appropriation of $50,000 to do that and for the printing of the report which will be made in regard to it. I am not at all strenuous about the amendment. If the Senate does not wish to put on this sum, let it go.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe the Senator has withdrawn his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WILSON. I will do so if there is any opposition to it. I do not care anything about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not know what it was for, except that I had communications for the first time sent to me to-day from the House after they were—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. COLE. I offer the following amendment, to come in as a proviso after the ninety-third line on the fifth page of the bill:

Provided, That section seven of the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," shall be construed to include the traveling expenses of such California and Nevada volunteers as were honorably discharged by reason of expiration of term of service, or for any cause, at points distant from the places of enlistment.

If the Senate need any explanation of this amendment I am prepared to give it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better have some explanation. I should like to know something about it.

Mr. COLE. Soon after the close of the war provision was made for the payment of the volunteers in certain States who were discharged at points distant from their place of residence or place of volunteering. Such was the case with the soldiers from the State of Michigan and some other States; and in 1867, at the end of the Army appropriation bill of that year, there was added the following section:

"SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Paymaster General be authorized to pay, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, in addition to the amount received by them for the traveling expenses of such California and Nevada volunteers as were discharged in New Mexico, Arizona, or Utah, and at points distant from the place or places of enlistment, such proportionate sum, according to the distance traveled, as have been paid to the troops of other States similarly situated: and such amount as shall be necessary to pay the same is herely appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The construction that has been given to this section by the Auditor's office is, that those who were discharged by reason of the expiration of their term of service were not to be benefited by the act, which was passed for their benefit, by reason of the omission of the words "discharged on account of the expiration of the term of service." This is merely to correct the law, so that those who were intended to be benefited by the act of March 2, 1867, may get what was then appropriated for their benefit. It requires no new appropriation; and with this explanatory section the purpose of Congress, as exhibited in the law of 1867, will be carried out.

I will add, in this connection, that these soldiers discharged at these very great distances from their places of enlistment, in New Mexico, in Texas, and in Utah, were in many cases utterly ruined in their attempts to get to their places of residence in California. Some were able to purchase the means of conveyance; but many of them were compelled to go on foot for the want of means a distance, in some cases, of a thousand or two thousand miles. This amendment is to carry out the purpose intended by the law of 1867, and I presume there can be no objection to it by any Senator who understands it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to understand it. I do not know that I have any objection to it; but I should like to know precisely what the difference is from the act of 1867.

Mr. COLE. By the omission of the words "discharged by reason of the expiration of the term of service" in the law of 1867 those soldiers were not provided for. That is the ruling of Mr. Brodhead, the Comptroller. This amendment will insert those words.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the amendment. As the law of 1867 stands it reads:

"As were discharged in New Mexico or Utah, and points distant from the place or places of enlistment."

Now I understand the amendment to be that it is proposed to extend this rule to all such persons as were honorably discharged at such places.

Mr. COLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This law of 1867 applies to all volunteers who were discharged. Does it not embrace them all?

Mr. COLE. No, sir. Mr. Brodhead, the Comptroller, construes it so as to exclude from the benefits of the law those who were discharged by reason of the expiration of their term of service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to move an amendment as a new section to come in at the end of the bill. I will observe that I have already given notice to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to audit and fix the interest accounts of Maine and Massachusetts for advances made by Massachusetts, then including Maine, for the United States during the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain, upon the basis that the claim for those advances belonged, after the separation of the two States, one third to Maine and two thirds to Massachusetts, and reckoning interest at six per cent. per annum; and that he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Maine and Massachusetts, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as he shall ascertain to be due to those States as herein directed to be audited and fixed: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, issue to those States bonds of the United States payable in thirty years and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. I raise the point that this is a private claim and comes within the prohibition of the rules of the Senate, and ought not to be admitted. It is a question, I believe, that has been decided half a dozen times since I have been in the Senate, and ruled out that many times.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon;

I have eighteen instances since 1854 of precisely similar cases which were put on appropriation bills. I hold them in my hand. I can call attention to them, and the Senate will see that the motion that I make now is precisely according to the precedents.

Mr. GRIMES. If there was anybody here who raised the point of order at the time those propositions were submitted to the Senate and put on to the appropriation bills, then the Senator's case would be analogous to those. It is not only a private claim, so far as the States are concerned, but it is for the benefit of private parties. The paper that the Senator himself submits shows it to be for the benefit of a railroad corporation. Let me read it:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to audit and fix the interest accounts of Maine and Massachusetts for advances made by Massachusetts, then including Maine, for the United States during the war of 1812-15, with Great Britain—

Before almost any man here was born—upon the basis that the claim for these conditions belonged, after the separation of the two States, one third to Maine and two thirds to Massachusetts, and reckoning interest at six per cent. per annum.

Does the Senator intend this to be compound interest, or only simple interest?

Mr. SUMNER. Simple interest.

Mr. GRIMES. I am glad to know that.

Mr. SUMNER. It is according to the habit of the Treasury.

Mr. GRIMES. The amendment goes on:

And that he is thereby authorized and directed to pay to Maine and Massachusetts, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the use of the European and North American Railway Company—

Mr. SUMNER. No, sir; for the use of the State, to be paid to the State.

Mr. GRIMES. Has that clause been stricken out? The mistake is certainly pardonable. I see that a pencil-mark is drawn through the words "for the use of the European and North American Railway Company, to which these interest accounts have been assigned by said States." The amendment continues:

such sums as he shall ascertain to be due to these States as herein directed to be audited and fixed: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion issue to those States bonds of the United States payable in thirty years, and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; the principal of such bonds to be made payable in lawful money of the United States.

Now, in order to avoid, as the Senator supposes, the objection that may be raised that this is a private claim for the benefit of a railroad corporation, a pencil-mark has been very adroitly drawn through the words which make that declaration; but it is nevertheless a fact known to every man in the States of Massachusetts and Maine that by a public act of the Legislatures of those States such claim as those States may have upon the Government for this interest has been transferred to railroad corporations. Now, the question is, whether such claims shall be recognized here on a general appropriation bill—claims that are so stale as this, and which have been transferred from the State for speculative purposes of railroad corporations?

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, is this question open to debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Points of order are to be decided, under the rules, without debate; but it is usual to allow a statement of the case. The Chair will not object to hearing a statement of the case.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Iowa has kindly called attention to a pencil-mark in the proposition which I sent to the Chair. The question before the Senate is according to the draft which has been read, pencil-mark or no pencil-mark. That has nothing to do with it. The motion which I make is that the Senate shall provide for the payment of the outstanding interest account of Massachusetts on account of her services during the war of 1812. The question is not in any respect affected by the consideration that Massachusetts has generously appropriated that fund to the construction of a very important railroad by which the general interests of the country will be advanced. Such is the fact; and therefore, though a Massachusetts Senator, I can plead for this appropriation without any suspicion of any pecuniary interest of my State. Nevertheless the money can only be obtained from the United States through the appeal of Massachusetts and of Maine, two States of this Union.

Now, sir, I have always understood, since I have had the honor of being in this Chamber, that the claim of a State was of such peculiar character and importance that it could not be treated as private; it was essentially public. So has it been treated again and again. I said that I had a list of eighteen precedents, during and since 1851, providing upon general appropriation bills for payment to States of moneys expended for war purposes or interest thereon; and one of these very cases is to pay Iowa moneys paid for troops called out by the Governor in 1857, 1858, and 1859; and that sum was moved on the Army appropriation bill June 21, 1860. I might go through the list. There is one, however, that is particularly applicable. It is known as the Maryland case. It appears on the bill of March 8, 1857, "to pay Maryland interest upon her advances from 1812 to 1815." That is precisely what is proposed by the motion which I now make, only Massachusetts is substituted for Maryland.

The Senator from Iowa used a strong expression when he characterized this as a "stale claim." Sir, why is it "stale?" The claims of Massachusetts were long outstanding. Their first settlement was as late as 1830, but the settlement was not completed until 1859. How could there be a settlement of an interest account until the question of the principal was determined? But this determination was not reached till on the eve of the rebellion under which our country suffered. Of course Massachusetts and Maine forbore to press their claim during the heat of the civil war; and it is only now when peace is restored that they appear again in this Chamber and ask that their accounts shall be finally closed by the payment of the interest which is due on their original claims. They ask simply for the interest that has been awarded to other States, to all the States of this Union; so that at this moment I may say of these old claims, this of Massachusetts, and Maine of course is included under Massachusetts, is the only one that is now in any respect outstanding. All of them are closed. Close this and you close that book of the past. The Massachusetts claims ever since my childhood have been more or less before the country. They were among the topics of interest I remember early in life, and they have continued down to this day. This is their last echo in Congress, so far as I, at least, can understand. Let this item be settled and the account is finally closed.

But I have already said it is not for the benefit of Massachusetts; for she has already set apart this money, when it shall be paid by the national Government, to the completion of a great national highway by which the commerce of the United States is to find a new avenue into the British Provinces; and so important has that avenue been regarded by those who are entitled to speak on the subject that it has been considered as an essential element of the national defense. By it the United States will be connected intimately with important and most fruitful and productive provinces. By it the communication will be facilitated; and should any trouble arise, of course additional opportunities would be afforded for the national defense. It was on that account that Massachusetts came forward and dedicated her claim to this object.

Now, sir, it is hardly fair to call the claim "stale;" for it could not come here properly before this day. It comes now in the natural course of time; tardily, I admit, but from the nature of the case it could not appear here before.

Sir, I have met every question of order, and I have briefly hinted at the questions of fact or of principle involved in the case. If there be occasion for any further argument I am ready to meet it.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not going to have any controversy with the Senator from Massachusetts as to whether this be a stale claim or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is a question of order.

Mr. GRIMES. I say I am not going to argue that question. I imagined that a claim which had been in existence for fifty-five years, or in other words ever since the boyhood of the Senator, as he expresses it himself, might possibly have become stale.

Mr. SUMNER. But my friend will let me remind him that the claim for the interest began in 1859.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator himself in his remarks must have satisfied every candid man here present that this is a private claim. He admits that by a public statute both of the State of Massachusetts and of Maine the whole claim of those States to this money has been dedicated for a specific purpose, transferred, in other words, from the States to a railroad corporation. The States have lost all their interest in it. Whatever claim they may have had themselves they have transferred to that railroad corporation, and it is for their benefit simply, in the name of the States, that this claim is now asked. There are $700,000, I am told by a citizen of the State of Maine, involved in the proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does he remember how much this same railway company received last year by an appropriation for squatters' claims under the treaty of Washington?

Mr. GRIMES. I really do not know, but we have been paying claims growing out of the northeastern boundary, interest accounts, and one thing and another of that kind, to Maine and Massachusetts ever since I have been here, and I think almost since the boyhood of my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts. I am very happy, though, to know from the Senator that this is the last claim Massachusetts has against the Government growing out of the war of 1812.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind Senators that this is a question of order on which the merits of the claim cannot be discussed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say one word on the question of order. The Senator from Iowa dwells with very considerable force on the fact that this claim has been transferred so that the equitable ownership of it is now in a company. It is nevertheless a claim of Massachusetts and Maine; and because they have given the ownership of it or the equitable interest in it to the advancement of a public work in one of the States, I do not see that that changes the fact in regard to its being a public claim, if it was so before.

The point that is taken is a point of law that, although this may be a just claim on the part of Massachusetts and Maine due to those States, and although it may be a public claim on their part, yet, inasmuch as the two States have dedicated the equitable ownership of it to a great public work, and a national work also, that takes it out of the rule. Did anybody ever hear anything more absurd than that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the rule under which the point of order is made by the Senator from Iowa.

The Chief Clerk read Rule 30, as follows:

"30. No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or treaty stipulation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read the latter part of the sixth rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"And every question of order shall be decided by the Presiding Officer, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the Presiding Officer may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer is only in the chair for the moment, and will submit this question, therefore, to the Senate under the rule that has just been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been repeatedly held that a claim made by a State for money past due on an old debt, even of a year old, an approved debt, to use a legal phrase, is a private claim. It has been repeatedly so held in the Senate. It makes no difference whether the money is due to a State or an individual. In this case the money is due to a railroad company; it is in the name of a State, but it is due to a private person or to a series of private persons called a corporation; and it has been held that claims made by a State stand in no better attitude, so far as this rule is concerned, than a claim made by an individual.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator be good enough to state where it has been so held? I have eighteen instances to the contrary.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question comes upon us suddenly, and I am not prepared with the cases. Now, what is an appropriation bill? It is to provide for the future service of the Government; to carry into effect existing laws; to appropriate the necessary money to enable the executive officers to execute the laws. That is an appropriation bill, and the reason of this rule is to exclude from a general appropriation bill the payment of past liabilities to private parties, to States, or to individuals. Therefore the rule forbids and discourages all these amendments.

As a matter of course, if this amendment is received as in order, it will open a wide latitude of debate. I hold in my hand a printed document of thirty-four pages, containing a majority and minority report on the subject in the House of Representatives. I know some of the parties who are interested in this railroad. I have looked into it so far as my time will allow me. This claim, as stated by one of the parties, involves $350,000, and from that up, as I get it from a member of the House, to $700,000. It is only part of a series of claims amounting to over $2,500,000 transferred by the States of Maine and Massachusetts to a railroad company. This particular claim for interest is selected from among four claims to be presented as an amendment to an appropriation bill. It is manifest that if we are to enter into this discussion we shall lose sight of the Army appropriation bill, and engage in a wide latitude of debate about a claim that has now gone on for fifty years without payment. It is a claim for payment made during the war of 1812, the last of which must have been made in 1815; consequently the junior claim is fifty-three years old.

Under the circumstances, at this period of the session, if we do not enforce the rule strictly it will involve us in great difficulty. I have felt disposed, from an examination of the papers, to look upon this claim as favorably as I could; but to offer it as an amendment to the appropriation bill will only lead other Senators to offer other propositions which may be reported from the committees, and we shall be involved not only in the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, but in an infinite number of private claims. I therefore intend to stand by the rule.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The first rule read makes an exception of claims to carry out existing laws. All the payments that have been made to Massachusetts have been made by law, as a matter of course and of necessity, to pay Massachusetts so much money with interest, and interest has been paid. Now what is this question? This question is simply nothing more than this: the computation of interest in carrying out these laws for the payment of the claim of Massachusetts was wrongly made; that is all. Massachusetts by law was ordered to be paid her claim, with interest. Very well.

This calls for recomputation, and why? What is the simple principle? It is that when these payments were made interest had accrued to the State. For instance, it went on up to the year 1830, when the first payment was made; when that money was received on the claim it was carried to the payment of the principal, and no notice whatever was taken of the interest. So of the second payment, so of the third, and so of the fourth, if there were so many; I am not familiar with the number. How do you compute interest on a note of hand? Suppose I was unfortunate enough to owe my friend from Iowa $1,000; if it ran for a couple of years, and I paid him $100 on account, I reckon he would take out the interest first, and not credit it on the principal. That is the way interest is computed in courts of justice.

I have carried this proposition through the Senate three or four times myself on that very principle, that the computation made at the Treasury was wrong. The proposition has passed the Senate, and I think once on an appropriation bill. The equity and right of it could not be disputed, and never has been. Congress in several cases, one of which was the case of Maryland, which was a striking case, ordered the recomputation upon that express ground, that the payments had been carried to the principal instead of first taking out the interest.

All these payments were made under existing laws to pay Massachusetts principal and interest; and now we say this is to carry out the law by having the interest correctly computed; it directs a recomputation by which Massachusetts will get what is due to her. That is all there is in the amendment, and now I put that as showing that this proposition comes strictly under the rule to carry out an existing law. That is the state of it precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. To what law does the Senator refer?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I allude to the laws that have been passed from time to time to pay Massachusetts the amount due to her. Of course those payments could not be made without law. I cannot, at this moment, turn to the statutes; but the Senator knows very well that payment could never have been made without an appropriation made by law; and it has always been held that an appropriation, so far as that is concerned, is to be considered as a law, for it is a law.

Mr. CONKLING. I understood the Senator to say that there was an existing law requiring the payment of this interest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; not this particular interest, but payment of the claim of Massachusetts against the United States with interest—a certain sum of money; and the interest has been computed as coming under those laws. The only question I make is that it has been wrongly computed, that the law has not been carried out, the claim has not been paid, for the reason that Massachusetts did not get the interest she was entitled to under those appropriations made for her benefit.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I should not say another word—my voice hardly allows me to speak—but for the singular ground taken by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] In the first place he cries out against this motion because he says it will cause debate. Why will it cause debate? I do not believe it. I believe that the moment it is decided to be in order, and I can see no other conclusion of the question, it will be found that there is no occasion for debate, its intrinsic equity will be so apparent.

Then the Senator, following the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] reminds us of the antiquity of the claim. Sir, I deny it in a just sense in this argument. The claim for interest is only since 1859. It was in 1859 that the last appropriation was made on account of the claims of Massachusetts. I have already remarked that soon after that the country became involved in difficulties, and Massachusetts was in no mood to appear here as a petitioner for interest on an ancient claim.

It is now that peace is restored that she does call for the adjustment of her accounts, and appropriates the interest generously, as I have already stated. Let me say, therefore, to my friend from Ohio that he does injustice to the case when he reminds us that in its origin it is fifty-seven years old. To be sure what was done originally was fifty-seven years ago; but it was only recently that the claim was audited by the Government and put in a condition for us to calculate interest upon it. Now it remains that the interest should be paid. Until that is paid there will be a standing claim of Massachusetts and Maine on the national Government. Why should it not be met now? What good reason can you assign? Are you not willing to do justice to those two States? Is there any reason why you should be in default to them alone? You have paid the interest to every other State of this Union, beginning in 1825 with Virginia, and in 1857 passing a special section very much like the one I now move for the benefit of Maryland. Why will you not do the same for Massachusetts? Are you deterred because Massachusetts announces in advance that she has pledged this money to a generous purpose for the national good?

But the Senator from Ohio insists, without citing a single case, that the claim of a State is a private claim. He goes on to characterize it by giving a reason. He says that it is because you cannot include in an appropriation bill the payment of an old outstanding claim; anything old and outstanding is in the nature of a private claim. So I understood the argument of the Senator, whether it be presented by an individual or by a State.

Now, sir, is that the case? I did not wish to take up the time of the Senate; but since the Senator from Ohio has made the objection it seems to me that it should not be settled according to his argument. It is important that the right of the States to present their claims on appropriation bills should not be thus summarily abandoned. I find on the Army appropriation bill of 1854 a proposition to reimburse California for expenses in suppressing Indian hostilities, $924,252. On the Army appropriation bill of March 3, 1857, there was an appropriation to pay Arkansas for militia called out in 1846. So on the same bill there was one to pay Florida volunteers called out in 1849 and 1852, and to pay New Mexico for troops called out by Governor Messerve in 1854. On the Army appropriation bill of 1859 there is an appropriation to pay Texas for companies of volunteers called out by General Smith in 1854; also on that same bill one to pay Massachusetts for advances in 1812-15, $227,195, being the last installment which has been paid by the national Government to Massachusetts on account of those original advances; and that was on an appropriation bill, an Army bill.

Sir, I will not take time. Suffice it to say that I have in my hand a list; I could go on year by year and show you how the claims of States have been recognized on your appropriation bills.

Mr. GRIMES. Allow me to make one suggestion.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. It appears from the record that this rule was not adopted until 1854. It was a long time after most of the instances.

Mr. SUMNER. All the cases that I cite are from 1854 down to the present time; none before 1854. The case of Iowa, if the Senator will pardon me for calling his attention to it, was on the Army appropriation bill of June 21, 1860, to pay Iowa for troops called out in 1857, 1858, and 1859. I could read the list; I could go through it all if the occasion would justify.

Mr. GRIMES. The point of order was not made in those cases.

Mr. SUMNER. What is to be our rule in this Chamber if not the precedents of the body, if not the legislation as you find it in the statute-book? I call your attention to appropriation bills year after year, and show you clauses in appropriation bills precisely like that which I now move, and yet the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Iowa tell us that the present motion is out of order. Then, sir, all these were out of order. Yet you find them in your statute-book. How could that be? Why, sir, the answer is clear that an appropriation for a State was not excluded as a private claim.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether this claim is entirely for interest?

Mr. SUMNER. Absolutely for interest; nothing else.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The payments that were made were made as principal?

Mr. SUMNER. As principal and partly on account of interest, but they did not completely satisfy it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But satisfied all the principal?

Mr. SUMNER. It satisfied the principal, but it has left an outstanding interest account which I have already said Massachusetts forbore to press during the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator state to what sum that interest amounts?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine says six or seven hundred thousand dollars. I have not made an estimate myself.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask how many times this has been moved in the last ten years on appropriation bills of the Senate and rejected?

Mr. SUMNER. Never once to my knowledge. The Senator confounds it with one or two other motions for the benefit of Massachusetts and Maine.

Mr. GRIMES. Which particular motions were those for the benefit of Maine and Massachusetts?

Mr. SUMNER. I think one or two of them were questions arising under treaties.

Mr. GRIMES. I think a former chairman of the Committee on Finance had this in charge, and I myself raised a question of order on it once and it was ruled out. I think his information will be more accurate than that of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the timber claim.

Mr. SUMNER. This claim, I am sure, has never been ruled out of order.

Mr. GRIMES. Has that timber claim been finally disposed of?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes; that is out of the way. The Senator need have no anxiety on that point. I do not wish to take time, but I believe that the point of order is completely established. It is in order; that is, unless you are ready to cut adrift from all the precedents of the body.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it is said that this money has been donated by Massachusetts, when collected, to a railroad company. What has Congress to do with that? The question is whether the money is due to Massachusetts, not whether Massachusetts gives it to a railroad company or a benevolent institution, or puts it into Boston harbor along with the tea.

Mr. GRIMES. It shows it to be a private claim.

Mr. MORTON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon, not if the claim is of a public character. In the first place the transfer here does not make it a private claim, and the question as to what disposition Massachusetts makes of it we have nothing to do with. If it belongs to Massachusetts, if the money is due to Massachusetts, she may give it to this railroad company, or to anybody else, or throw it away. We have nothing at all to do with that, and it does not affect our rights or obligations in the least. Now, sir, how can it be a private claim? Massachusetts is not a private party like an individual. The States are recognized by the Constitution. Senators who come here do not represent private parties, but represent States; and if a claim is due to a State it is of a public character, and the fact that Massachusetts proposes to give it to a railroad company does not make it a private claim. It is essentially public in its character. It seems to me, without going into the merits of the claim, that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is a point of order, and it is whether the present amendment can be properly offered to an appropriation bill. The Chair directed the Clerk to read the rule of the Senate upon that subject, and the character of this amendment certainly does not bring it within any of the classes of amendment that are provided for in that rule of the Senate as admissible.

The honorable Senator from Maine says that this is an amendment in pursuance of a law. If there can be found any law which directs this interest upon advance made by the States of Massachusetts and Maine in the war of 1812 to be paid I will concede for myself that the amendment is properly presented; but I have seen no such law and no such law has been read.

The Senator from Massachusetts reads from various appropriation bills to establish the position that the principal of the claims of certain States against the United States was directed to be paid, but he has not read a single instance, if I recollect aright, in which the interest upon any of these claims was attached to an appropriation bill. Mr. President, the general rule and the general practice of the Government is not to pay interest at all. The measure of justice which the Government usually deals out is the principal of all claims, public or private, in behalf of States or individuals, without interest; and the several precedents that the Senator from Massachusetts read provided simply for the claims of States being paid and said nothing about the interest. Now, in defiance of the provisions of the rule of the Senate which regulates the character of amendments that may be offered to general appropriation bills, and in defiance of the general practice of the Government, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to attach to this general appropriation bill a bill not to pay the principal, but the interest upon certain sums advanced by the States of Massachusetts and Maine in the war of 1812; and I come to the conclusion that it is not in order to propose such an amendment on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts brought his last remarks to a close by assuring the Senate that claims like this had never been ruled out of order under this rule. I think he stunted himself unnecessarily in his expression. He might have made it much more ample. He might have said that claims like this and claims of all sorts never could be excluded under this rule. On the theory which he advances I should like to know now what claim, if it be entertained by Congress, is excluded by the rule before us unless this be one? It is due under existing law. Why? Because the law is that all claims for honest debts are to be paid. Wherever a debt is owing it is to be answered. Therefore the law exists. Is not that true of all claims unless you have adjudicated that the claim never existed and in truth does not exist? And then, of course, it is not to be entertained at all. Take the case of any honest claim; it is the case of a request to pay money upon the ground that it is due, due by law, and therefore by existing law; and therefore this rule does not apply to it!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair to arrest the business of the Senate in order to announce the order of the Senate, which is that the Senate take a recess from four o'clock until seven o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that that order be suspended.

Mr. RAMSEY. I raise a point of order. I do not see how that can be done after four o'clock has arrived. There is no time. The recess has really commenced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order of the Senate—

Mr. DRAKE. What is the order of business for this evening?

Mr. GRIMES. Business from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY. Nothing can be done now, as I understand the rule, but take a recess. The time has arrived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order of the Senate it becomes the duty of the Chair to announce that the Senate now take a recess from four o'clock until seven o'clock, the evening to be devoted to bills from the Military Committee.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p.m.

BREVET COMMISSIONS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 273.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 273) to amend the act of April 10, 1806, for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States. The bill proposes to repeal the sixty-first article of an act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the Armies of the United States, approved April 10, 1806, and to provide that hereafter commissions by brevet shall only be conferred in time of war and for distinguished conduct and public service in presence of the enemy, and all brevet commissions are to bear date from the particular action or service for which the officer was breveted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GETTYSBURG AND ANTIETAM CEMETERIES.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up Senate joint resolution No. 119.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 119) authorizing the Secretary of War to take charge of the Gettysburg and Antietam national cemeteries. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to accept and take charge of the Soldiers' National Cemetery at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, and the Antietam National Cemetery at Sharpsburg, Maryland, whenever the commissioners and trustees having charge of those cemeteries are ready to transfer their care to the General Government; and when they are placed under the control of the Secretary of War they are to be taken care of and maintained in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish and protect national cemeteries," approved February 22, 1867.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT SNELLING RESERVATION.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up Senate resolution No. 211.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 211) for setting apart a portion of the Fort Snelling military reservation for a permanent military post and the settlement of all claims in relation thereto. The resolution proposes to empower the Secretary of War to select and quiet the title to so much of the military reservation of Fort Snelling as the public interest may require for a permanent military post, and to settle all claims for that reservation and its use and occupation upon principles of equity.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAULT STE. MARIE RESERVATION.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 1489, granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the American Baptist Home Mission Society, by good and sufficient title, a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, not to exceed one acre, now occupied by a mission building owned by the society.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH CABLE.

Mr. STEWART. Yesterday, on my motion, the House of Representatives was requested to return to the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. No. 228) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty certain submarine telegraph cable. It has been returned; and I now move to reconsider the vote by which that joint resolution was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

ABSENT OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 201.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 201) to drop from the rolls of the Army officers absent without leave. It is an authorization to the President of the United States to drop from the rolls of the Army for desertion the following-named officers: Second Lieutenant Daniel Hitchcock, fifth cavalry; Second Lieutenant W. G. McKay, twenty-ninth infantry, and any other officers who are now or may hereafter be absent from duty three months without leave; and any officer so dropped is to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and not to be eligible for reappointment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if it requires an act of Congress to drop these men?

Mr. WILSON. It cannot be done without an act of Congress unless they are court-martialed. We passed an act last year and dropped some from the Army, and here are men who cannot be found in the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Cannot they be stricken off without a special act?

Mr. WILSON. They cannot; but this bill allows it hereafter to be done without a special act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to it. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S HOSPITALS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 960.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 960) relating to freedmen's hospitals. It proposes to direct the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen to continue the freedmen's hospitals at Richmond, Virginia; Vicksburg, Mississippi; New Orleans, Louisiana; and in the District of Columbia, including the asylum for aged and infirm freedmen and for orphan children, but the expense thereof is to be paid by the Commissioner out of moneys heretofore appropriated for the use of the bureau, and the hospitals are to be discontinued on the 30th day of June next, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, in the discretion of the President of the United States. The bill further provides that the second section of the act entitled "An act relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance," passed on the 25th day of July, 1868, shall be so construed that the educational department of the bureau and the collection and payment by the Commissioner of the bureau of moneys due to colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, shall be continued until otherwise ordered by act of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY JUDGE ADVOCATES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 1487.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army. The preamble to the bill declares that doubts have arisen whether the judge advocates of the Army, though originally commissioned in the regular service, constitute a permanent corps in which vacancies may be filled, and that it is expedient that the corps be made permanent and that vacancies be filled therein; and the bill provides that the corps of judge advocates of the Army be fixed at twelve members, including the Judge Advocate General and an assistant judge advocate general, and authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill all vacancies which have occurred or may hereafter occur therein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to strike out the whole bill and to insert—

That the department of judge advocates of the Army be, and the same is, fixed at ten members; and the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill all vacancies which may have occurred or may hereafter occur therein.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. It is a House bill that comes here, which provides for the appointment of what is called a corps of judge advocates, and provides that it shall consist of twelve persons. The amendment provides that it shall not be called a corps like the corps of engineers, but a department; and provides for striking out the preamble and to amend the title so that it will simply declare and fix the status of judge advocates. It makes two less than the House proposed, and I think they can get along with ten.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs inform the Senate how many of these judge advocates there were before the war?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot. There was a Judge Advocate, but how many persons were employed I do not know; but that kind of work has enormously increased, and there is an immense quantity of it to do. We cut off two from what the House proposed.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Its title was amended, on motion of Mr. WILSON, to read, "A bill to declare and fix the status of judge advocates of the Army."

TWELFTH KENTUCKY BAND.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 72.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 72) for the relief of John M. Broome and others, the band of the twelfth Kentucky infantry. The preamble of the resolution states that John Martin Broome, leader of the band of the twelfth regiment Kentucky volunteer infantry and Adam Skilling, Christian Kuboz, George Scott, and Rudolf Vanderan, musicians of the first class, George Hoeflinger, Peter Oehlschlager, John Eck, and Philip Weis, musicians of the second class, and Alvis Berg and Philip Hermann, (the last named having died in hospital on the 31st of March, 1862,) musicians of the third class, were enlisted as the band of musicians of the twelfth Kentucky infantry on the 3d day of January, 1862, and performed service and were discharged by the authority of law and military regulations as the band of the regiment until the 10th of September, 1862, without having been paid and without having furnished to the War Department the proper rolls of muster-in and muster-out of service. It is therefore proposed to direct the proper officers of the War and Treasury Departments to allow to these musicians the same pay and allowances from the time of their enlistment to the date of their discharge as though their muster-rolls had been properly furnished and were in all respects regular.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 959.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 959) to repeal the second section of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the chairman inform the Senate what is the purport of the section proposed to be repealed?

Mr. WILSON. It is the section put upon the Army appropriation bill at the time set forth; which requires that the General of the Army shall reside at Washington; that all orders of every kind shall go through him to the Army; which does not permit the Secretary of War or the President to send an order or direction unless it goes through the General; and if the General should happen to be absent on business it would be a pretty difficult thing to do. It is proposed to repeal it.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very much gratified that a bill has been introduced to repeal that clause in the appropriation bill of two years ago. It is an enactment that should never have been made, in my judgment, and it was simply intended to shackle the present President of the United States in the exercise of his constitutional powers. I am very much gratified that the party who have passed enactments in derogation of the Constitution and of the constitutional powers of the President are now seized with a disposition and a purpose to some extent to stop them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUILDINGS AT FORT TOTTEN.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 230.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 230) authorizing the erection of brick buildings for military purposes at Fort Totten, in Dakota Territory, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POMEROY. In most of the western Territories we have a kind of lime-stone much cheaper than wood or brick either. I do not see why you should say brick. Stone has been used in our military posts in the West. I do not know whether there is any lime-stone in Dakota or not, but I have never seen any of the western Territories that did not have plenty of it. I have no objection to this if there is no lime-stone there; but there is generally a layer of lime-stone or sand-stone through that country. It is cheaper than brick.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WALTER D. PLOWDEN.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 1823, for the relief of Walter D. Plowden. There is a report in the case, which can be read if anybody desires to hear it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1823) for the relief of Walter D. Plowden. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Walter D. Plowden, a colored scout and spy, the sum of $1,000 for military services rendered the Army of the United States under Major General Hunter, in the military district of South Carolina, in the war of 1861 for the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. WILSON. If any member desires to hear it, there is a full report which can be read. It is a very extraordinary case.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. BINGHAM in the House of Representatives, on the 1st instant:

The Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the memorial and evidence of Walter D. Plowden, praying compensation for military service, made the following report:

The claimant, who was born a slave in Washington county, Maryland, emancipated in early life found his way to the city of New York, and in 1861, at the breaking out of the rebellion accompanied the forty-seventh regiment New York volunteers, Colonel Henry Moore commanding, as servant to Major White, surgeon of the regiment, into South Carolina.

After the discharge and muster-out of Major White, with whom he had gained a large experience with the colored people and the troops on the coast, he was employed by Major General Hunter, then in command of the Federal forces at Beaufort and Hilton Head, as a scout and spy, and as a guide in various expeditions from the coast into the interior of the State.

In the spring of 1863 he was sent by night on a secret expedition, with a row-boat and eight colored men, up the Combahee river one hundred and thirty-one miles, to the crossing of the Charleston and Savannah railroad in the vicinity of the Pocotaligo, from which he returned in five days, reporting the condition of the bridges and trestle-work and the strength of the military guard of the enemy at that crossing.

Immediately following he accompanied the well-known expedition of Colonel Montgomery, thirty-fourth United States colored troops, against Pocotaligo as a guide, which was successful in the destruction of the railroad bridge and the release from slavery and the service of the enemy of eight hundred colored men and a large amount of property, which were used by the United States Government. Soon thereafter, in May, 1863, he was sent on a third expedition as scout and spy to the Cosawatchie river, with a boat and five colored men, with orders to cut the telegraph on the Savannah and Charleston railroad at Gardner's Corners, the crossing of the railroad over the Cosawatchie. This bridge was so strongly guarded that after several efforts by night to cut the wires the attempt was abandoned and the expedition was unsuccessful.

In June following he was sent up the Ashepoo with a boat and eight colored men, and was perfectly successful in setting the bridge of the Savannah and Charleston railroad on fire and burning it up. The rebel guard attacked his little crew in their flight, and they barely made their escape.

In July following he was sent up the Broad river with a boat and eight colored men, making progress by night and scouting out into the country to the camps of the enemy by day, taking observations of the location and strength of picket posts and the position of military forts and works of the rebels. He returned with all this information to General Hunter. Immediately thereafter he accompanied General Benham's expedition up the Broad river to Chisholm's Landing as guide and spy. The force was four gunboats and a brigade of troops, which inflicted serious punishment for two days to the rebels, capturing prisoners and destroying military works and materials of war.

After his return from this expedition he was sent ten miles within the rebel lines from the mainland at Hilton Head, and returned bringing information to General Saxton by which he captured the rebel pickets on the next day.

In September following he was sent as foot spy to Bluffton, within the rebel lines, and returned with the information which led to its immediate capture by General Hunter. He accompanied the troops as guide to Bluffton.

In December following he was sent as spy up Stono inlet to Waupo Cut for information as to the condition of the rebel main store building and which was expected to come out of the inlet very shortly. On this expedition, for want of sufficient force to outwrest the rebels, he was captured in his flight from Waupo Cut, when he was almost within shot of the Pawnee, the Federal man-of-war, to which he hoped to escape, lying at the mouth of the inlet.

He was put into prison at Charleston, January 2, 1864, and closely confined without food but just sufficient to support life for more than fifteen months, and was released when General Sherman's army marched into South Carolina.

In this service he invariably reported to General Hunter, General Saxton, General Benham, or General Terry, and received nothing as pay except the necessary outfit of arms and subsistence.

The committee have carefully collected this history from Major General Hunter himself, from General O. O. Howard, and from Chaplain Mansfield French who was present and had knowledge of the circumstances here detailed.

At the time when this claimant was employed by General Hunter that officer states that he had not in his possession secret service-money in order to pay him, and that he is well aware that he never was paid for the important services thus rendered.

Owing to his captivity the claimant lost his health and strength, and now remains broken and almost physically incapacitated for manual labor.

From these considerations the committee recommend that a bill be passed for his relief, appropriating $1,000 in compensation for his services as scout and spy in South Carolina during the war for the suppression of the slaveholders' rebellion.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that that subject ought to have been referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON. I am sure the Senator from Kentucky cannot oppose a matter of this kind. This person rendered about four years' service and was fifteen months in prison.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is a case that should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY. The report was read as from the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report was from the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS. What committee of the Senate has had the bill under consideration?

Mr. WILSON. It was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs with some other bills of that nature, and it was thought proper by that committee to act upon it.

Mr. DAVIS. Its having been acted upon by the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives is one evidence, independent of the intrinsic evidence afforded by the subject itself, that it should have been referred to the Senate Committee of Claims also. I have no doubt that this negro rendered very important service. I have a little doubt that thousands and tens of thousands of white men rendered as much service without having ever received any extraordinary compensation from the Government for it. I therefore move that this report and bill be referred to the Committee on Claims of the Senate that they may examine the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I should feel entirely dissatisfied with this report and with this bill myself. It is made out that this individual served four years; was imprisoned; lost his health, and rendered most important service; and then here is a bill to pay him $1,000. A thousand dollars for four years' service for great exposure, loss of health, and the performance of valuable services to two or three of our military commanders! If I could not have reported $5,000 I would not have reported a cent for four years' services and such sacrifices. I think that the bill ought to go to a committee who will report $5,000. If he is not entitled to that much the report is not correct. You have made out in the report sufferings and privations and services that entitle anybody to that amount. Either make no such report as that or make a decent compensation.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Kansas is certainly the friend of the negro. Now, I suppose that the white soldiers who performed as long service and rendered as essential service and were as often in captivity, and who suffered as much or more than this negro, could be numbered by thousands. I never have known, as far as I am conversant with the proceedings of Congress, of a special movement being made in favor of any white soldier who rendered any such service. If this negro soldier served four years in the Army he was entitled to pay just as any other soldier of the Army was, and I suppose he has received it. If he went upon perilous service that was nothing more than was common with all the soldiery of the Union Army. If he was captured that fate was common with probably one half the white soldiers, or a great number at least.

I do not see any reason for making this negro and his services, however signal and valuable they may have been, to be governed by any other rule than that which controls the services of the white soldiers of the United States Army. I have no knowledge myself of a claim of that kind ever having been referred since the commencement of the war, by the order of the Senate, to the Committee on Military Affairs. But as the honorable Senator from Kansas thinks that this is but a mean pittance, which it is disgraceful to the Committee on Military Affairs to have recommended, and is anxious for it to be recommitted, with a view to see whether something like an adequate compensation and reward for these extraordinary services shall not be made, I hope that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will agree that the subject shall take that course.

Mr. POMEROY. If this man had been a white soldier, as the Senator says, or a soldier of any other color, he would have been entitled to a pension of at least eight dollars a month, equal to the interest on $1,500 a year, and he would have been entitled to that for a lifetime. If he lived only ten years it would amount with the interest to about sixteen hundred dollars, and yet this committee find a man who served four years, lost health and limbs, rendered important service to four or five commanders, and they propose to pay him $1,000, when, if he had been a white soldier, they would have paid him eight dollars a month pension, which, taken at the ordinary age of our soldiers, might be reckoned to last for twenty years. Take the average pension of the young men who have been disabled and they will draw their pensions for twenty years.

Mr. DAVIS. Is or is not the pension law the same in relation to negro soldiers that it is in relation to white soldiers?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; but this man was not a soldier at all. He did the duty without having been mustered in, and therefore cannot draw pension. This provision is in lieu of pension. If he had been a soldier, white or black, he could have drawn a pension, and that would have ended his claim. This is compensation for services when he was not entitled to a pension, and a very small compensation too.

Mr. WILSON. This bill was passed by the House of Representatives; and when it came here it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who have reported it favorably. I of course would not make any objection to its going to the Committee on Claims if it was not important that it should be passed at this session. This man went out as a servant to an officer early in the war. For four years he served as a scout and spy for four or five general officers, and did the most important service. He was not a soldier, did not draw pay, was entitled to no pay, entitled to no bounty, entitled to no pension. He was captured in one expedition and held fifteen months in prison in Charleston, where he was punished for his fidelity to the country. He was kept in close confinement on account of his services as a spy and a scout. His health was severely injured. He is now a poor, broken-down wreck, living on charity at this time. It seems to me that this compensation, as is said by the Senator from Kansas, is a very small sum; but at the same time it may keep him out of the poor-house, and I think we ought to pass the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I say give him nothing or else give him something that is respectable.

Mr. DAVIS. On a further representation of this case I withdraw the motion that I made to recommit the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 489, to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco.

Mr. STEWART. I wish the Senator would let that lie over until the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] is present.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. Neither of the Senators from California is in his seat now; and I hope it will not be pressed at this time.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 1279, in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1279) in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill provides in the first section that when a soldier's discharge states that he is discharged by reason of "expiration of term of service," he shall be held to have completed the full term of his enlistment and be entitled to bounty accordingly. The second section declares that the prohibition of bounty in the fourteenth section of the act of July 28, 1866, to any soldier "who shall have bartered, sold, assigned, transferred, loaned, exchanged, or given away his final discharge papers, or any interest in the bounty provided by this or any act of Congress" shall not apply in cases when the full amount of bounty has been advanced by States, counties, or towns, to the soldiers or to their families, but the State county, or town, advancing the same shall be entitled to it. The third section provides that the widow, minor children, or parents, in the order named, of any soldier who shall have died after being honorably discharged from the military service of the United States shall be entitled to receive the additional bounty to which such soldier would be entitled if living, under the provisions of the twelfth and thirteenth sections of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. The first section of the bill provides that if any soldier was discharged, as there were some at the close of the war by expiration of term of service, a few days before the three years' term was out, he shall be entitled to bounty. Some of them were within a few days, within a week, of filling out their term when the regiment was mustered out, so that they did not quite serve their full term.

The second section that I have proposed to strike out provides that counties or towns or States shall have the bounty money they advanced as bounties to soldiers where the soldier has lost, or sold, or given away his papers. In such cases he could not have the benefit of the bounty, and I do not see any reason why we should take money out of the Treasury to give to States or towns or counties.

The third section simply provides that the widow or children of any deceased soldier who if living would have been entitled to receive the bounty of fifty dollars for two years service or $100 for three years service shall have the benefit of the bounty. I think it is just and proper. It was supposed to be the law until the Department made a ruling to the contrary. This will include the families of a few men who died after their discharge—probably not a great many—and it will relieve their families. The men would have been entitled to the bounty if living, but they died after the close of the war. It cannot cover more than a few hundred cases. It is absolutely right and just in itself. If the men had lived they would have had the bounty, but as they died we propose to give it to their widows or children.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear that section read which saves the right of heirs to the bounty.

Mr. WILSON. It is the third section.

The Chief Clerk read the third section of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I think the principle of that is right, but I happen to know that—I believe in two instances, there may be more—cases like this have come before the Committee on Claims: the soldier died after the bounty was allowed but before it was paid, and creditors have appeared; and in two cases, I think, the Committee on Claims have reported bills allowing the bounty to be paid to creditors. Those cases I suppose ought to be excepted. If we once pay the money to the creditor we do not want to pay it again to the heirs.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I inquire of the Senator if any of those bills have been passed?

Mr. HOWE. I am not sure whether they have been or not.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have my doubts whether they ought to be passed paying these bounties to creditors. It was not the intention of Congress to settle the debts of our soldiers, but it was a gratuity to them individually.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; but where an honest debt existed against the soldier why not so apply the money? The two cases that I have in my mind are cases where the debts arose in nursing the soldier during his last sickness. The Treasury Department reported that the bounty could not be paid to the heirs, could not be paid to the representatives, the individual having died: it belonged to the Government. We thought it was fair that the Government should pay such claims as these rather than put the money into the Treasury. I do not know whether either of those bills to which I have referred has been passed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is a very exceptional case that the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. WILLEY. One of the cases to which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin refers was a very peculiar one. The soldier was sick, and he made an express contract with the party keeping him in his last illness that when he got his bounty and his back pay he would pay the old lady who kept him out of his bounty and back pay; and in consideration of that assurance she undertook to keep him, and did keep him, and he had no other means of support or of commanding that attention which was necessary in his last illness.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the bill by adding as additional sections:

And be it further enacted. That all claims for the additional bounties granted in sections twelve and thirteen of the act of July 28, 1866, shall after the 1st day of May next be adjusted and settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury under the provisions of said act; and all such claims as may on the said 1st day of May be remaining in the office of the Paymaster General unsettled shall be transferred to the Second Auditor of the Treasury for settlement.

And be it further enacted. That all claims for bounty under the provisions of the act cited in the foregoing section shall be void, unless presented in due form prior to the 1st day of December, 1869.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORLANDO BROWN.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill No. 880.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 880) for the relief of Orlando Brown was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury in the examination and settlement of the property and money accounts of Orlando Brown, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States Army, to credit and allow him all expenditures of money and property made by him in good faith under the orders or in conformity with orders of his superior officers; and especially all expenditures of quartermasters' property made by him for the benefit of freedmen, under the orders of Major General Benjamin F. Butler, in like manner as if the same had been regularly expended in the quartermaster's department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEGED NORTH CAROLINA DESERTERS.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 877.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 877) to remove the charge of desertion from certain soldiers of the second North Carolina mounted infantry. The bill recites that it appears from the evidence of certain officers of the second North Carolina mounted infantry, the records of the War Department, and the official orders of Major General Schofield, that certain soldiers were detached from the second North Carolina mounted infantry to join the third North Carolina mounted infantry to make a raid into the enemy's lines, in June, 1864, for the purpose of destroying railroad bridges and harassing the enemy, and that while absent from their regiment upon such duty they were borne upon the rolls of the second North Carolina mounted infantry as deserters; and it proceeds to direct the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from certain soldiers of the second North Carolina mounted infantry whose names are given.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE NORTHRIDGE.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 768.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 768) for the relief of Mrs. Jane Northridge. It provides for the payment to Mrs. Jane Northridge, widow of William Northridge, deceased, late colonel fifty-ninth regiment New York State volunteers, of $10,260 32, in full payment for moneys advanced and services rendered by him in raising troops in the State of New York.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us hear the report in that case.

Mr. ABBOTT. I send the report to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. ABBOTT, on the 16th instant, from the Committee on Military Affairs:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred for investigation the claim of Mrs. Jane Northridge, widow of William Northridge, deceased, late colonel of the fifty-ninth regiment New York State volunteers, beg leave respectfully to submit the following report:

It appears, upon examination, that on or about the 1st day of June, 1861, Colonel Northridge commenced recruiting troops for the United States volunteer Army; that on or about July 24, 1861, he reported to the War Department and was authorized to complete a regiment of volunteers; that at that time he had five companies and had established a camp at Elm Park, Staten Island, Richmond county, New York, and that from the 1st day of June, 1861, to the 13th day of October, 1861, at which time his men were consolidated with others and formed the fifty-ninth New York State volunteers, he had expended large sums of money in subsisting said men.

It appears, upon an examination of official copies of affidavits on file in the War Department furnished by the honorable Secretary of War to your committee, that the sum of $5,490 was paid for provisions; that the sum of $3,525 was paid for wall and "A" tents; that $451 32 was paid for rent of offices; that $388 was paid for printing, and that the sum of $406 was paid for stoves and for camp and garrison equipage, and that the total amount thus expended by Colonel Northridge was $10,260 32.

It further appears that at the time these various purchases were made, receipts and vouchers covering the entire amount of said expenditures were obtained by said Northridge, and by his order were carefully filed away with other valuable papers and were lost in the month of August, 1862, in the following manner, to wit: while the Army was lying at Harrison's landing, Virginia, an order was issued by Major General George B. McClellan, ordering all the extra baggage of officers to be forwarded to a place of safety, and the Army to be in readiness to move in light marching order, and that in obedience to the said order Colonel Northridge ordered his trunk to be placed in charge of the regimental quartermaster and by him to be transported to barges lying at Harrison's landing, Virginia, to be shipped to Washington, District of Columbia, and from thence to their destination; that his trunk, containing the bills and receipts heretofore referred to, including other papers pertaining to the organization until the 13th day of October, 1861, with his extra clothing, was carefully marked and directed to be shipped by express from Washington, District of Columbia, to Baltimore, Maryland, and that his trunk was lost or stolen after delivery on board the barge as aforesaid; that he has made diligent search for the same, but without success. While the petitioner in this case is unable to produce the proper receipts for the expenditures made, it is shown by positive evidence from whom the purchases were made, and the reason why other vouchers cannot be produced is satisfactorily accounted for in the affidavit of James H. Birdsall, late captain in said regiment. It is in evidence that there were about two hundred men subsisted daily from the 1st day of June, 1861, to the 1st day of October, 1861, and further, that the men were accepted by the United States Government.

The committee further find that the said Northridge, during his lifetime, presented the aforesaid claim to the War Department for adjudication, and that the same was rejected for the reason that he, Northridge, was unable to comply with a certain order existing in regard to the payment of such claims, to wit, furnishing receipts of the parties to whom payment was made, the reason being as heretofore stated, that such receipts were unavoidably lost with his baggage. It further appears that the said Northridge is now deceased, and has left a widow surviving; that his record while in the United States Army was good; that he subsisted out of his own private funds an average of two hundred men daily from the 1st day of June, 1861, to the 13th day of October, 1861; and that the Government in the hour of trial had the aid and services of the men thus recruited.

Your committee, therefore, firmly believe that the claim is just in every particular, and earnestly recommend that the bill be at once passed for the full amount of said claim.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This report does not state what became of this property afterward. It states that there is evidence that these purchases were made. I do not know what this man bought stoves for between May and October, which is one of the items. There is a large item for tents and other sorts of property. The committee ought to inform us what became of this property; whether it was turned over to the quartermaster's department afterward, or, if not turned over, whether it was sold and the proceeds accounted for in any manner. It occurs to me by what appears on the face of the report that this matter is indefinite.

Mr. ABBOTT. These bills were contracted in the early part of the recruiting service, when things were done all over the country very irregularly, and there is no evidence as to what became of the tents or the other property. The stoves, I suppose, were used, as was the custom in a good many camps in the early part of the war, for cooking before the soldiers had learned to cook with a camp-kettle. Anybody who was familiar with the recruiting business, with the raising of troops in the early part of the war, knows that a great deal of the business was done in an irregular manner. This man did not even take the care to get the proper orders, and so he could not draw from the quartermaster or commissary or ordnance departments; and instead of that, before the time came for him to be mustered in, he took his own money and supported his men. He only began to transact business with the Department after he had raised men enough so that he was mustered in. It appears moreover that he did not collect, as was the ordinary custom, the bills due him for recruiting under the rules and regulations, having proceeded informally during the whole time; and yet the men he raised were ultimately mustered in, and he became lieutenant colonel of the regiment. I have examined this claim with a good deal of care, and while it is informal, as is suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I am satisfied that the claim is just. The evidence is abundant.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator why this bill is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs? I understand the report to come from that Committee. There ought to be uniformity of decision; but if the claim of A be referred to the Claims Committee and B's to the Military Committee and C's to the Naval Committee, of course there will be no rule of adjudication common to all the cases. These cases ought to be decided on some principle, on some analogy to the law.

Mr. ABBOTT. I will answer the Senator from Indiana. This is a case that relates peculiarly to military matters. It may have been presumed that the Committee on Military Affairs was more conversant with the proceedings in these cases and better able to understand what were the merits of a claim of that nature than the Committee on Claims, because more of these cases came before it, and therefore it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is plausible, but not quite true. That would distribute all the cases that come into the Senate among the different committees, and there would be nothing peculiar for the Committee on Claims. For instance, if a man's claim was in any way connected with naval affairs, it would go to the Naval Committee; and if he served the State Department in any way, and was the loser, he would go to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and so of the other committees. Now, there is advantage given to this claim by sending it to the Military Committee, because that committee as a matter of course does not feel itself held before the Senate by the same stringent rules that govern the Committee on Claims. I know how that is very well. There is a liberality of view taken by other committees which would not be taken by that committee. Then, that committee is very much crowded with business, and so this claim gets in ahead of other claims that ought to be considered.

This may be all right; but I want to ask the Senator one more question, whether it was not a very common thing for officers to incur expenses in raising their companies and their regiments, and very large sums; and whether it is the purpose of the Military Committee to compensate them? I know the fact that during the war large sums were paid out by officers in raising their companies and their regiments. I did not know we were going to undertake the work of compensating them for those outlays.

Mr. ABBOTT. In the early part of the war things proceeded for several months in a very irregular manner. A man desired to enter the Army of the United States; he commenced to raise troops; he did not obey what rules and formulas there were at that time. If anybody will investigate the whole thing he will find that it was almost all done irregularly. If a man did proceed regularly he could collect his recruiting account. This man omitted to do it, as a great many others did; and a great many got their pay and adjusted their accounts afterward.

Mr. GRIMES. I am very well aware that the objection raised by the Senator from Indiana would have been considered a few years ago a very valid one. Such a claim as this would not then have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to be considered, but would have been sent to the Committee on Claims. But the Senator should remember that we have bravely gotten over all the rules we used to be governed by. To-day we had submitted to us a claim which, judging from its antiquity, should be considered by the committee of my friend from Nevada, [Mr. Nye,] the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and yet it was reported to us by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I refer to the proposition relating to expenses incurred in the war of 1812-15. It was reported to us from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I suppose it came from that committee simply because that war was a foreign war. I cannot conceive of anything else. Perhaps, however, as has been suggested to me, it was because it was foreign to any subject that was under consideration at that time. [Laughter.] I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina how it happens in this particular case that this man had his vouchers with him on the James river for money that he expended months and nearly a year before on Staten Island, New York? Is it the habit of men who transact business of this kind to carry around in their personal baggage vouchers for money that was expended months before in a distant State and carry them to the seat of war?

Mr. ABBOTT. It is the most natural thing in the world. I have known numbers of cases myself where officers kept their papers in their trunks. It was the most natural thing for an officer to do. He did not know when he was going to want them, and he thought that was the best place to keep them, by him. In this case this officer not comprehending the condition of things at Harrison's Landing when the order came for a restriction of transportation was, like everybody else, obliged to send his baggage away, being a trunk, and it was lost in the journey.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, $10,000 paid to this man, perhaps, is not of very much consequence; but I do think it is an important question that the Senate ought to consider, whether we are now going to commence the rule of paying officers for their outlays in raising regiments and companies, and their irregular outlays that were made for that particular purpose. If so, the bills will come in in very large sums. I have had very many officers tell me that they had, before the war came on, laid up perhaps a thousand, or two thousand, and some three or four thousand dollars, and they had spent it all in raising their regiments. They did not view it as a claim against the Government. They did not think of presenting a claim. It was their ambition to raise their regiment or company, and so they expended their money; but if Congress now proposes to indemnify officers in such cases the whole volume of the claims will come in here.

Mr. ABBOTT. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me a moment? The remarks of the Senator do not apply to the equity of the matter. Anybody who understands that sort of proceeding knows that if this Colonel Northridge had taken the care to comply with the formulas of the quartermaster's and commissary departments he would have got his pay anyway; but he being perhaps ignorant of these forms did not take the care to do it, and he therefore could not collect it in accordance with the rules and regulations of the quartermaster's and commissary departments. That is simply all there is about it. I did exactly this same thing myself, and got my pay because I complied with these formulas and rules.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is all right; I am glad you got the money.

Mr. ABBOTT. I looked out for that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Perhaps in all the cases to which I have referred the money could have been had again from the Government if the forms had been observed. I do not know how that is. I know that officers will have claims for enormous amounts against the Government if this principle be established, and I think Senators had better decide the question whether they are willing to meet it. There were nearly two hundred regiments raised in Indiana, and I suppose that almost every officer who raised a company or a regiment incurred some considerable expense, but it was an expense that he was willing to incur, because he was ambitious to raise his company or regiment at once and get it into the field. If we are ready to pay all such claims we can vote on this bill understandingly.

Another thing; if this bill be passed it ought to be in the form of a bill not to pay money, but to refer the question to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the claim upon satisfactory evidence, simply waiving the technical and formal proof which the regulations require. Is it proper that the committee shall audit the case? I think this bill ought not to pass in its present form.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not like to interpose any objection to this claim, but—

Mr. ABBOTT. If the bill is to lead to further discussion I shall consent to have it passed over for the present.

Mr. WILSON. It had better go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ABBOTT. Very well; I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE. I do not see the slightest necessity or propriety in sending it to the Committee on Claims. It has been examined by one committee, and I suppose that committee have presented the facts of the case to the Senate. That is all the Committee on Claims can do.

Mr. ABBOTT. Then let it be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The bill will be passed over informally if there be no objection.

CAPTAIN G. BRYSON'S COMPANY.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move to take up House bill No. 1872.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1872) providing for the payment of Captain Goldman Bryson's mounted company. It provides that the company of mounted volunteers raised and commanded by Captain Goldman Bryson, of Cherokee county, State of North Carolina, under authority of Major General Rosecrans, and received into the service of the United States by Major General Burnside September 29, 1863, and such men as were accepted into the service of the United States by Captain Goldman Bryson within one month thereafter, and the widows, heirs, and legal representatives of the officers and enlisted men, shall be entitled to pay, bounty, pension, and allowances according to their grade, and time of service as other volunteers in the service of the United States, notwithstanding any informality in their muster or enlistment into the service of the United States, under such rules and regulations as may be adopted by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury.

Mr. ABBOTT. There is a report in that case which can be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill shows on its face what it is for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will not be read unless it is called for.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. There is no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY INSTRUCTORS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 1490.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1490) to define the pay of officers of the Army detailed to act as military instructors. It provides that all officers detailed to give military instruction in colleges and universities under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, shall, while so detailed, be entitled to the full pay of their respective grades the same as if they were in active service.

Mr. WILSON. I move to add the words "and allowances" after "pay," in line eight, and in line nine to strike out the words "the same as if they were in active service."

Under an act of Congress, supposed to be a wise one as all acts of Congress are, certain officers of the Army on the requisition of the colleges of the country were detailed by the Secretary of War to act in these colleges as teachers of military tactics, &c. At the War Department or at the Treasury the law is construed to mean that an officer so detailed is entitled to only his regular pay. This bill provides that he shall have the pay and allowances he would have were he in active military service. If the thing is worth supporting at all, if it is a good thing, I think it should be so, because these officers cannot live on their pay.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the law require them to go into the school or college if they do not wish to go?

Mr. WILSON. No; but it authorizes the Secretary to detail them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Secretary indicates to an officer, "We want you to go and teach in some school." Is he bound to go?

Mr. WILSON. We authorize the Secretary to detail officers for this purpose where they are required, and it is supposed to be an excellent law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had expected that the Military Committee before this time would have reported a bill to repeal that act. It is about time to do it. It ought to be repealed, in my opinion, and I do not think we had better drive any spikes down to make it any firmer on the statute-book. It would be better to repeal the other law than to pass this.

Mr. WILSON. I am not particular whether it is repealed or not; but so long as it is the law it seems to me these officers ought to have the same pay that they would have were they in the service of the country. There is no question about one thing, that the practical operation of the law is training a great many young men of the country and fitting them by their studies to understand something about the Army.

Mr. CONKLING. I was about to inquire of the honorable Senator, then, why he says he does not care whether it is repealed or not. I understand this provision to be one of the most wholesome things and one of more consequence than almost any provided in the statute.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether these officers when they are connected with colleges are exercising an independent command and entitled to brevet pay?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand when an officer is exercising an independent command he exercises it with his brevet rank and is entitled, if in active duty, to brevet pay.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. From what I understand these officers—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) Does the Senator from Iowa yield the floor?

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly; I am after light.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The officers who have been detailed for this service have not been in any instance that I am aware of such officers as would have been assigned to active service.

Mr. WILSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. GRIMES. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs corrects the Senator from Vermont as to that.

Mr. WILSON. Officers from the field have been detailed for this special service, but they are generally the older officers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am not aware of any instance of an appointment of that kind; but they are men who have reached old age.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Superannuated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Well, say superannuated; men who have been wounded and men in poor health; such men as the Secretary of War could spare. He never has in any instance that I can find detailed an officer who was fit for active duties.

Mr. GRIMES. That is no answer to my question. He has detailed to this duty some brevet major generals. Now, my question is, if a brevet major general is in the exercise of a command by virtue of his rank, in active duty, does he draw a brevet major general's pay?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. All these officers are on leave of absence and receive less pay, and the institutions that employ them make it up where they are unwilling to come for the pay they receive upon leave of absence.

Mr. WARNER. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that the answer to his question will depend upon the order of the President. If an officer is assigned to duty with his brevet rank he then draws pay according to his brevet rank; but unless he is so specifically assigned he only draws the pay of his lineal rank.

Mr. BUCKALEW. We ought to have some distinct explanation in a case of this sort. How many persons have been detailed to this duty?

Mr. WILSON. About twenty or thirty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There can be but twenty-five detailed under the law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Of what rank are they, and what is their fixed pay, and what will be the amount to each of the allowances which are made? What does the word "allowances" mean? Does it mean compensation for imaginary servants who are not employed?

Mr. WARNER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to answer his question? Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly; I am in the pursuit of information.

Mr. WARNER. The Senator will understand that the pay of an Army officer is the pay proper—that is, so much per month—and allowances, which consist of rations and allowances for servants' hire and for pay of servants, clothing of servants, and other matters of that kind. The officer is authorized to draw his rations and allowances in kind, or to commute them at their money value according to a fixed standard. The word "allowances" refers to those matters. They are fixed by law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is what I supposed. But an officer sent to a college, and occupying a moderate-sized room along with another person, I suppose, will not need the services of a servant; he will not need to clothe a servant; he will not need a great many other things which an officer in the Army on duty, or even in quarters, may require and is justified in having or in incurring. We have a bill thrown in here and we do not know the practical effect of it.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me a single moment I think I can explain to him what the practical effect of it is. We passed a law in 1866 which at the time of its passage had the very strong support of the friends of education in the country, especially of military education to the young men of the country, authorizing the Secretary of War to detail a certain number of officers when called upon for the purpose of teaching in these institutions. By a construction given in the Department to that law these officers when so detailed are allowed only their pay proper.

The pay of an officer depends entirely on his rank. If he is a captain it is one thing, if he is a lieutenant, another. It depends entirely upon his grade. Then the allowances are all set forth. Rations, servants, fuel, and quarters, everything is set forth precisely according to their rank. If he is an officer of high rank those allowances amount to quite a sum. Now, the construction is that these officers are entitled to nothing except their pay proper. If an officer is detailed from the field, where he can live cheaper than he can anywhere else, and is sent to a college, in the city of New York for instance, his expenses are increased and he is cut off from everything but his pay proper; he has no rations, no servants, no fuel or quarters, no allowances of that kind.

But I do not wish to consume the whole evening in considering this bill, and if Senators are opposed to it I would rather let it go, although a great number of petitions have been sent to us asking for this change, because I have some other bills that I am very desirous of getting through to-night. If gentlemen are determined to oppose this bill I shall abandon it for the present.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator will not abandon this bill.

Mr. WARNER. I hope not, too.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to read the section, if it be the only section, as I believe it is, in consequence of which this bill is reported. It is section twenty-six of the act of July 28, 1866:

And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of promoting knowledge of military science among the young men of the United States the President may, upon the application of an established college or university within the United States, with sufficient capacity to educate at one time not less than one hundred and fifty male students, detail an officer of the Army to act as president, superintendent, or professor of such college or university; that the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed twenty at any time, and shall be apportioned through the United States, as nearly as practicable, according to population, and shall be governed by general rules, to be prescribed from time to time by the President.

The proposition is, in a time of peace, at the conclusion of a war which, at least, does not presage another, to leave the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, invested with the power to detail officers not exceeding twenty in number for the whole United States to colleges or schools capable of educating at one time one hundred and fifty male students. If I had not heard Senators object to this provision I certainly should not expect any objection to a provision of this sort. Assuming that the President is provident and discreet in his detail—and I mean thereby that he does not take an officer of use somewhere else, as, of course, he would not, and detail him—I should like to know to what ministration, to what mission of any sort, officers not exceeding twenty in number below a certain rank could be more properly devoted than to such a purpose as that here intended?

I have heard during my service in Congress oftentimes a crusade preached against West Point. I do not sympathize with that. But I have never heard the most ardent partisan of West Point deny the propriety of disseminating in other colleges some rudimental knowledge of the manual of the soldier. Here is the provision, appropriate and adapted to the cheap, indeed the inexpensive, dissemination of that knowledge. Why do I say "inexpensive?" Because these officers are not to be mustered out of service in lieu of being thus detailed. So that the question is whether they shall be somewhere, they not being required in the Army—because if they are required of course a request from a college will not be complied with—or whether their time shall be devoted to affording instruction in military drill and the rudiments of military science.

I speak in this behalf in one instance for the Cornell University of the State of New York, the pride of which university resides in the fact that it is founded in the munificence of a single citizen, but still more in the fact that it promises to be a school at which any man may become proficient in any branch of knowledge taught in any educational seminary in the world. It professes to do that, and men skilled as judges in its coming excellence, not only in this country but abroad, believe in the assurance that it will do that.

Take this single college to illustrate. It wants, as it seeks now, a military officer holding no rank higher than that of major to come and reside in the locality of the college, to teach the young men there, some of whom are able to pay for their tuition and some of whom receive tuition without payment in money for it, the rudiments of military science. If a war were in progress, and these officers were needed elsewhere, of course I should not advocate their presence in such places; but the whole theory of this statute is permissory. The President in his discretion is simply authorized, upon a request of this sort, to spare from the active service officers not exceeding twenty in number for the whole United States; and the request cannot legally proceed from any college less in size and capacity than that which enables it at one time to educate at least one hundred and fifty male students.

Now, Mr. President, I do most earnestly expostulate with my honorable friend from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania against their attempting to act upon the impatience of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to dispose of the business of his committee at this late hour of the day and of the session, or in any other way to give this bill a death blow. I hope most earnestly it will be allowed to pass, and that these lieutenants and majors, during the months that they may be detailed to give this instruction, will not thereby be diminished in their pay below the point which will enable them to live; and that is all that is contained in this proposition.

I have but one other remark to make, and then I will give way for other Senators. Some Senator inquired whether this bill gave pay upon the idea of brevet rank. Certainly not, as is shown by the facts and shown by the language of the bill. It is simply that while they are absent performing this duty they shall not thereby forfeit any part of their pay; but it is to be the same as if they were in active service. Now, sir, when you consider that it is committed to the discretion of the President, and that no President exercising a sound discretion will withdraw any man from the service who is needed elsewhere, I respectfully submit that the bill is absolutely without any objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will not detain the Senator from Massachusetts with his other bills by speaking at length on this; but I must add a word or two to what I said before. I would have no particular objection to furnishing a major for the Cornell University of the State of New York, an institution of great merit and of much promise, as far as I am informed; but here is a question of more than twenty universities or literary institutions in different parts of the country, for each of which the Government of the United States is to furnish a professor. If we are to send a man with the rank of brigadier, and these details have become so common that I suppose you might make up the whole twenty from the list of brigadiers, you will furnish a professor drawing six or seven thousand dollars a year. I suppose professors ordinarily in colleges do not draw more than one half that amount. These professors, then—for they would be such—endowed by the United States, would get about twice the pay that would be obtained by those employed by the institutions themselves.

Now, sir, I have great doubts about the propriety of our entering upon this system of furnishing professors for literary colleges at the expense of the Treasury of the United States. It may have been well enough at the close of the war when we had a great superfluity of officers and did not know exactly what to do with them, and the idea of retrenchment and cutting down the Government expenses in regard to the Army had not taken root in the public mind, had not made its entrance, at all events, into the two Houses of Congress; but, sir, the idea has come to be entertained that we are to reduce the Army. Bills with that object were introduced at the last session of Congress, and have been at the present session. Whether we are to have an effective measure or not before the adjournment I do not know; but it is to be expected that within a reasonable time our Army will be largely reduced; and although the officers may not be reduced in the same proportion in which we reduce the rank and file, I suppose there will be a large curtailment of them. At all events, as resignations take place and as deaths happen, the vacancies need not be filled and we can reduce our efficient force very largely.

What object has the Government of the United States in furnishing professors to these literary institutions? The officer is sent there, it is said, to instruct the young gentlemen, not less than one hundred and fifty in number in any one institution, in the art and mystery of war. What does that mean? I suppose he is to instruct them in engineering and in sundry other branches of mathematical and other sciences, as well as in military tactics. If he is a competent man he will be a very efficient professor in the institution. His services may give it popularity and credit and character in the community, and may insure its prosperity.

But what next? Is it expected that these young men who are instructed in these institutions will enter the Army? No, sir. You have provision already made for the education of young men with that object at West Point. They are to pass out into all the ordinary occupations of civil life from these institutions; and the main result and the practical result is that you have a literary institution provided with a professor by the Government of the United States, and we have paid him.

Now, we are informed that the ordinary, that is the fixed, pay of these officers in the way of salary is not sufficient; that we must vote to them all the liberal and, by the way, the indefinite allowances which have crept into our military system, which in my judgment is itself, if not a huge body, at all events a great practical inconvenience. For one thing, we never know how much an officer gets unless we enter pretty deeply into the question in the Departments of the Government. I remember that at one time we were endeavoring to fix the pay of the Judge Advocate General. We had three committees of conference on the question of his compensation and no end to debates. Our present minister to the Court of Madrid entered at large into the question. He undertook to conduct a contest against establishing a new office, the pay of which should not be known to Congress and the people; and after the expenditure of an immense amount of eloquence on the subject and the consumption of a large amount of public time he was defeated in his purpose; the Judge Advocate General had a salary given to him and all the allowances; and whereas we supposed it would amount to some four thousand dollars annually, I believe it turned out to be six or seven thousand dollars. At that time I was impressed with the conviction that this system of making allowances to officers in the Army was a very bad one, and that if it were possible in the nature of things some reform should be introduced. At all events, now when we are going to transform them into professors of colleges to give gratuitous instruction to the young gentlemen, the sons of the wealthy people of our country, who ordinarily attend those institutions, let us know how much we are to pay; let us fix the compensation of our Government professors at some amount which the people will understand and which Congress will understand also.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the Senate will understand this question, and when they do understand it I think they will pass this bill. The detail of these officers for duty in these colleges is already authorized by law. This bill simply and only provides that when thus detailed they shall have the same pay they would have if they remained where they were before they were detailed. That is all there is in it. I repeat that it does not relate to the matter of detailing at all. The detail of these officers for teaching in colleges is authorized by a previous law. The only effect of this bill is to provide that when thus detailed in pursuance of the law their pay shall not be reduced.

As to this talk about indefinite allowances, there is nothing indefinite about the pay of an Army officer. There is no trouble in calculating to a cent what the pay of an officer is under any circumstances. The matter is fixed by law. There is no evading it.

Mr. CONKLING. But if the Senator will allow me a moment, suppose there is something indefinite about it; and suppose, by churlish legislation, we refuse to apply that provision, whatever it is, to those who are detailed; the result is, they will not be detailed; and then the same inconvenience will remain. It does not make a farthing's difference to the Treasury, but simply deprives these colleges of the services of men, which services will not cost the Government a cent.

Mr. WARNER. Certainly; that would be the only effect produced. The object is to provide that when these officers are detailed in accordance with law, and not by their procurement but perhaps against their wish, their pay shall not be reduced. That is all there is in this bill.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to say two or three words about this bill. The first question that I consider is whether this service proposed in the act which has been read here is of any value to the country. A military education is thought to be so important that you maintain a school for that express purpose and pay pupils for attending it. That school, to be sure, will furnish officers enough for your Army in time of peace; but, I take it, there are very few on this floor who are willing to bet their lives to-night that we are always to be a nation at peace. We have seen war; we may see another; and when you saw the last one your Government was very eagerly looking in every direction after men who had received a military education at any time, or any smattering of military education, or even had done respectable duty in a militia regiment; and we all know that in respect to military skill and proficiency those who turned out our enemies in that war were in advance of us. They had more men fitted by education to take commands than we had. Under these circumstances I think no one will deny that these officers, when you consider that each one of them will have under his instruction not less than one hundred and fifty pupils, may furnish them the rudiments of a military education which, when you want a larger Army than you have, may be made available, may be utilized.

Now, then, what is it going to cost you? It is of essential service to the Government. What is it going to cost you? Nothing; not a dime. Every one of these officers is in the service of the Government and is going to be there, and they have nothing in the world to do. You have more officers than you have men to command. I understand the rank and file of your Army to-day amounts to less than forty thousand—I think about thirty-six thousand—and you have officers for fifty-four thousand men, and you are not going to muster them out. They have nothing to do. They are going to be paid. The question is, will you lend these unemployed officers to the work of instruction in these colleges until you have some regular, legitimate military service for them to do? I do not think that is a very prodigal thing for the Government to do. I hope the Senate will consent to let this bill pass.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator might also add that the practice of the War Department is to detail only retired officers of the Army to this service.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have not been able to discover exactly, from the remarks that have been made, this question; but, as I understand it, it is that the War Department may detail military officers to serve in the capacity of professors in colleges that have one hundred and fifty students. As to the propriety of detailing officers of the Army for the performance of this duty, I cannot conceive that the Senate can be at all in doubt. That it will be of advantage to the Army no Senator will doubt for a moment when he examines into the great capacity and achievements of officers who have heretofore been absent or resigned, or been detailed, either by their own acts or the acts of the Government, from the ordinary routine of Army life. I point to General Sherman as an illustration of the benefits accruing to the service by the detailing of officers away from the ordinary routine of Army life. I might point to Grant himself, who also broke off from the routine of Army life. It will be of advantage to the Army and to the officers themselves to give them the experience of civil life and of the active duties appertaining to a professorship in the instruction of youth. It will also be of advantage to the colleges in the introduction of new experience, if it may be so termed, of men who have been experienced in the active duties of Army life; and when it is considered that the nation is not subjected to any expense by this provision other than it would be without it, I think it is a cheap advantage obtained both for the Army and for the educational institutions throughout the country.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a very grave mistake, I apprehend, from the information I get from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to suppose that nobody is detailed to these colleges except retired officers. There are other than retired officers detailed to these places, and the moment you pass a law authorizing the Government to pay to any officer who may be detailed to an easy place at one of the northern colleges the same compensation according to his rank that you give to a man who is exposing himself on the frontier fighting the Indians you will find that your whole Army will be besieging your Commander-in-Chief or the general in command trying to get detailed to like positions.

The Senator from Rhode Island does not seem to understand what this bill is. It is not the pay proper that it gives; it gives commutation for all the allowances that are made to an officer in active service, for his horses, for his forage, for his servants' commutation, for lights, for quarters, for fuel, for everything, amounting to more than double the amount of his pay proper.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call the Senator's attention also to the wording of this bill. It is said that these are retired officers who are to be sent on this duty. The bill provides that they shall draw "full pay and allowances of their respective grades the same as if they were in active service."

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, as though they were in active service in the field. Now, is it fair to those who are in active service, exposing their lives on the frontier and to the pestilence and the storm, wherever they may be ordered, that these persons who are living in ease and quiet at your northern colleges shall draw precisely the same compensation that they draw? I am not a very great admirer of this system. I have never yet been able to come across a gentleman who believed that the mere manual of arms, which is about all that they teach, makes a soldier. All these comparisons that are drawn between the men who are educated in the manual of arms and the manual of the soldier at a college and General Grant and General Sherman, who have had a regular, thorough military education, I think are very far from proper illustrations of this subject.

Mr. CAMERON. To my mind this bill is eminently proper; but I would make a couple of amendments to it. In the first place, I would amend it in the seventh line by inserting after the word "detailed" the words "and there shall be none detailed but retired officers;" and in the eighth line I would change it so as to read "the full pay, without allowances, of their respective grades, the same as if they were in active service." With these two amendments I think the bill will do a great deal of service. I remember very well that when the war began we were anxious to secure everybody who had the most trifling military education. We even took a great many men, every of whom became generals afterward, who had been dismissed at West Point, or at least failed to pass their examinations. So glad were we to take anybody who had the least smattering of military education that we took any one of that kind.

I believe, with the Senator from Iowa, that the mere knowledge of the manual of arms is nothing; but there is something gained in turning the attention of the youth of the country to the subject of military education. You turn their minds in that direction and if they happen to have a turn that way it will be seen. I do not think we can do better with these retired officers of the Army, because we have got to pay them their pay proper, as it is called, at any rate, nor do I think they can be better employed than in instructing the youth of the country. They would be glad to go to these institutions, because when they are retired from the service they get no quarters, no fuel, no commutation of any kind, I believe; but while employed in this kind of service they will get whatever the schools think proper to pay them, and they would take with them all the knowledge which they had acquired during their long service in the Army, and not only in the Army but the education they had acquired at West Point. I think the bill eminently proper. I have had occasion in the course of last year to go frequently to the War Department asking for details of officers of the Army for schools in Pennsylvania; especially the other day I went there, on the recommendation of the Governor and the whole Legislature, to get somebody properly qualified to take charge of our agricultural college. I was told by the Secretary of War that he could not afford to send a man there who was in active service.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator does he want a military man to teach agriculture to the people of Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMERON. No, of course not; but the plowman has often been a good soldier. I remember that old Stark used to plow in his field somewhere in the east when he heard the guns of the British—there is a picture of it some place about here—and he left the plow with the coulter sticking in the ground and he went to the war. Everybody remembers what he said about Molly Stark.

I trust, Mr. President, in conclusion, that this bill will pass, because we can take these gentlemen who are now useless to the country and put them in a service where they will be exceedingly useful.

Mr. SPRAGUE. We do not want it amended.

Mr. CAMERON. I think we do. I intend to move the two amendments that I have indicated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania, on reflection, will hardly insist upon his first amendment, that the officers detailed shall be only those who are on the retired list. That is a subject which may with much greater propriety be left to the Secretary of War to determine. It may be that there are not twenty retired officers suitable for this purpose. That this plan of employing some of our officers in this way is a good one I have no doubt. In a college in which I have some interest, in New Jersey, there is an officer who is doing very valuable service there at this time. I suggest that the other amendment in the eighth line, "and allowances," be stricken out for this reason let them have full pay without allowances, and let the institution which employs them supply that by way of salary; it is but little for them to do. That is the arrangement in the case to which I refer in New Jersey. There the institution pays as much as the Government does, that being a case where the officer is on half-pay, being on the retired list.

Mr. CAMERON. That is just what my motion is, to make the bill perfect so that there can be doubt about it. The Senator from New Jersey says the college with which he has a connection makes that bargain. I want to make this thing so positive that the Secretary of War shall designate nobody to go to one of these institutions except upon these conditions. It is adding just so much to his compensation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest to the Senator to strike out the words "and allowances," but do not put in the words "on the retired list." Let the Secretary take whom he pleases.

Mr. CAMERON. I would not agree to do that, because I want those who are fit for active service to do duty in the field. Every man who is fit for service and paid by the Government ought to be in the field. I want to take the meritorious classes who are retired because of age and yet move in the vigor of youth. For instance, there is the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE;] although he is a very old man age has no more impaired his powers than it has mine. [Laughter.] If he were in the Army he could perform all these duties just as well as a younger man. I remember how well and how gallantly he came here—the first man with a regiment at the beginning of the war, old as he is—and gladdened the heart of every loyal man in this District. Why should he be deprived, if he belonged to the regular Army now, of an opportunity of being useful in this respect? I insist on my amendment, and I trust the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Old men, I have observed, are always exceedingly fond of young men, and when they have anything to do, in companionship or otherwise, they generally select that class of men for their companions. Now, in this case, being an old man myself, I am convinced that young men will better perform the service of professors and teachers in our colleges among young men, than old, retired, or broken down men; and for that reason I am opposed to the proposition of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, and I trust it will not prevail.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to withdraw the amendment inserting the words "and allowances," and let the bill stand as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the Senator will not withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the bill be read as it stands without the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That all officers detailed to give military instruction in colleges and universities under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1836, shall while so detailed be entitled to the full pay of their respective grades the same as if they were in active service.

Mr. WILSON. This bill comes to us from the House, and the Committee on Military Affairs agreed to insert the words "and allowances." That amendment was pending; but I withdraw the amendment, and if the bill passes it will not have to go back to the House. I want to get through with it some time to-night.

Mr. FOWLER. I have but one remark to make. Two Senators supporting the bill have furnished me with arguments against the whole bill. I should place the arguments in a reverse position to that in which they were offered. One says that there is much gained by detailing officers for the purpose of instructing these schools so as to practically turn the attention of our youth to military subjects. The other says that we have had wars, and that we may have wars again. That is unquestionably true. If we turn the attention of the youth of the country to military subjects by detailing Army officers for this purpose and making every college of one hundred and fifty pupils a military school you will unquestionably have wars again.

Now, sir, I should much prefer, if these gentlemen are going to turn their attention to the instruction of youth, that they should go into our colleges and teach the scholars science and morality, and leave the instruction of the manual alone, and leave all military subjects out of the schools. I should greatly prefer that the Government of the United States should detail or pay some good old Quaker ministers, either male or female, to take the place of these military gentlemen in instructing the youth of the country in the arts of peace and the love of peace, and entirely averse to martial questions. I think no greater evil can result to the American people than this tendency to instruct our youth in military science, and to increase the martial spirit of the people, which is already far beyond what it ought to be, perhaps beyond that of any other people in the world. We want these colleges to direct the attention of the youth to the arts of peace, and of peace alone. If we are going to make the colleges in the different States military schools let us dispense with the enormous expense of supporting the Military Academy at West Point.

Again, there is another argument in favor of dispensing with the expense of that Academy. I have heard some Senator argue to-night that by detailing military men in this way they gain more expansive views and greater knowledge of our people, greater knowledge of the country, &c. That may be true; and if so it furnishes me with a very adequate argument against supporting the West Point Academy any longer. Let us dispense with that institution.

Again, if our best officers are brought from the plow, and men can conduct great military operations without any military education at all, we can dispense with all these schools.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from Tennessee. These gentlemen will not only teach the art of war, but we all know that in addition to their knowledge of war tactics they are generally highly educated. In the first place, they are the best mathematicians in the country as a class. They are often very good engineers. Sometimes they are French scholars. They always have a systematic education, and I think, with hardly an exception, they are gentlemen highly qualified as instructors; and whether we require them as teachers of the art of war or not, they will be valuable in our seminaries and colleges. I would detail them to this service for that reason. In addition to that I would take them because there is a class of meritorious officers who have been retired and many more who will be retired only because they have lived too long in the way of somebody else. When they are retired they do not get compensation enough to enable them to live as comfortably as they did before. I would give them their full pay proper, which is probably not half what an officer now gets in pay and allowances. Wherever there is a meritorious retired officer in the neighborhood, I would allow his neighbors to select him as the principal of a college, and then go to the Secretary of War for his approbation, and let that man be detailed for that service. The Secretary of War, as I said awhile ago, refused to send a man in active service that the agricultural college in my State called for. I do not think the officer knew much about agriculture; but he knew a great deal about mathematics and other things. I think this bill is eminently proper for many reasons, but especially because it will provide places for those meritorious retired officers—one-armed and one-legged heroes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it be in fact desirable to connect military studies with the ordinary studies of our colleges, there is very little difficulty about that. If this important institution in New York desires to do so there is no trouble about it. There are now in every county in the United States men who are well trained as military men, capable of teaching pure military science, whose services can be obtained by the colleges to fill a military professorship at very little cost; at a reasonable salary, at least; perhaps, at a much less salary than we pay the officers of the regular Army. I do not care about discussing on this occasion whether it is best to connect military studies with the ordinary studies of colleges. I have my doubts about that; but if the colleges wish to do so then let them do it.

Mr. President, this bill is but an entering wedge. First, from the regular Army, supported by the Government, we furnish to colleges professors of military science. Then the next proposition will be that we shall furnish men competent to teach engineering. It is known that many of our officers are very skillful engineers; that their education at West Point has qualified them in a very superior degree to teach engineering; and it is a very useful study in colleges. I do not agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that they will be very useful in teaching agriculture. The spear will have to be converted into the plowshare first.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator will allow me to suggest that I did not say they would be useful in teaching agriculture, except that I believed that the study of mathematics and everything that tends to cultivate the mind will improve agriculture.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then the next step, as I said, will be to call from the Army, from the duties of their profession in the engineer corps, men to fill the professorships of engineering. Then, perhaps, it will go still further, and all professorships will be filled by military men.

I was going to offer an amendment to this bill to repeal the section in the act of 1866. That is what I think ought to be done; but as Senators say that these chairs are not likely to be filled from the Army unless we increase the pay, perhaps to defeat this bill will answer every purpose; and after a short time I know that propositions of this sort will not be entertained. In 1866, just at the close of the war, when there was a good deal of military spirit in Congress as well as out of Congress, a bill of this kind would easily pass; but after a little it will not be so popular to fill our colleges with military men. I am in favor of having such a number of officers as is necessary to command the companies and regiments that we have, no more. We ought not to be paying a corps of officers to teach school. I may be mistaken, but I do not think it is the business of this Government to furnish school teachers either of high or low degree. The purposes of this Government are well enough defined. This does not fall within any of them. I think it is an abuse. I think it is starting off in a wrong direction, which ought to be corrected as soon as possible. If any schools or colleges wish to employ men to teach military science, let them employ them. There are thousands of men well qualified all over the country who would be very glad to accept professorships in colleges. Let them be employed. It will give employment to men, some of whom find it difficult to provide for themselves because of wounds received in the service; but do not call from the regular Army the men who are paid for their professional services to the country.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to strike out all of the bill after the word "grades." The bill will then conform to the ideas which have been stated by my colleague and other Senators.

Mr. CAMERON. If my colleague will allow me, I will add some words to the amendment I offered before. After the word "grades" I move to insert the words "without allowances except what the schools or colleges employing them may agree to pay."

Mr. SPRAGUE. We had better have that read at the desk, so we may see how the bill will stand if amended in that way.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out after the word "pay" the words "of their respective grades the same as if they were in active service," and to insert:

Without allowances, except what the schools or colleges employing them may agree to pay.

So that it will read:

That all officers detailed to give military instruction in colleges and universities under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, shall, while so detailed, be entitled to full pay without allowances, except what the schools or colleges employing them may agree to pay.

Mr. WILSON. I appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw that amendment and let us pass the bill as it came from the House. If we do that we shall not have to send it back to them. It simply allows full pay. I withdraw my motion to insert the words "and allowances," in order to let the bill pass in the form in which it passed the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not change the bill in the least. These institutions now pay these parties, in many instances, because they will not come and perform the service without extra pay beyond what they get from the Government.

Mr. CAMERON. I think my amendment makes it so plain that everybody can agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] which has been read.

The amendment was rejected—ayes six, noes not counted.

Mr. WARNER. I now renew the amendment which was withdrawn by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I beg the Senator not to do that.

Mr. WARNER. Well, I shall not press it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I now insist on the question being taken on my amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was after the word "grades," in the eighth line, to strike out the words "the same as if they were in active service;" so that the bill will read:

That all officers detailed to give military instruction in colleges and universities under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, shall, while so detailed, be entitled to the full pay of their respective grades.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question and stated that it was difficult to determine the result of the vote.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; let it pass.

Mr. CAMERON. No; I will not let it pass.

Mr. GRIMES. He gives it up.

Mr. CAMERON. But I do not give it up. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRIMES. The other side give it up.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say a word on the amendment. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to pass the bill as it is, so that the moment you bring these retired officers into the service of these colleges you give them all the compensation and all the allowances which an officer in active service gets in the Army. That is not the intention of the Senate; and it seems to me strange that Senators cannot see it. The object of the bill is to employ retired officers, meritorious men who can render useful service in these institutions throughout the country, and now you propose to bring them from their retirement and give them the compensation of officers in the field while acting as schoolmasters, professors, or teachers of some literary establishment. The officer may be seventy-five years of age and teaching mathematics, and if a war should come up at that moment, by the bill you propose to give him the compensation, if he is a general, that a general in the field would be entitled to. That is not what the Senator from Massachusetts intends.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts concedes that the amendment of the Senator's colleague was adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly I do. I will give it up if I can only get the bill through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, if the Chair decides it in that way I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] is adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. Let the bill be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

Mr. CAMERON. The words "without allowances" should be added.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no need of that.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. DRAKE. I will inquire whether under the law as it now stands these officers are entitled to the full pay of their respective grades?

Mr. CAMERON. There is some mistake about this. When an officer talks about his pay he means all his pay. When he speaks about it technically he says "pay proper," and every officer understands that just as well as you understand the multiplication table. I shall be content with the insertion of the words "pay proper," if Senators prefer them, because every officer understands what they mean; but I do not intend to delude these officers with the idea that we have passed a bill which will give them the same pay as if they were not retired. I move that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I think there ought to be no equivocation about this bill. If certain pay is meant which is less remunerative to the officer than the pay to which he would be entitled in active service it ought to be so expressed; and if it is intended to give the whole pay, including all the perquisites of rations for servants and subsistence for horses, and all that sort of thing, it ought to be expressed, so that the accounting officers will know exactly what the intention of Congress is in passing the law by its words. As the words have been stricken out it seems to me to leave the meaning of the whole in doubt and equivocal.

Shall while so detailed be entitled to the full pay of their respective grades the same as if they were in active service.

These words either have a meaning or they have no meaning. If they are intended to have the same meaning in relation to officers who are detailed on this service that they have when they relate to officers in active military service they ought to be retained, but if they are not intended to have that meaning there ought to be some words used which would express the intention of Congress not to be to give them as much of pay and perquisites as are given to them when in active service.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that the pay of the Army is well defined. Allowances are one thing; perquisites and all these matters are other things.

Mr. DAVIS. Could not servants' rations, subsistence for horses, and all that kind of thing be included under the word "pay?"

Mr. SHERMAN. The words "full pay" include allowances, according to the construction put upon those words by the proper accounting officers. The words "pay proper" include the pay only; but if you insert the words now proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania you will have the law stand precisely as it is now. An officer detailed for duty in a college now receives the "pay proper." The purpose of this bill was to give him "full pay," and my own impression is that it ought to be passed just as the House passed it. If officers are detailed for duty on this service at colleges, they render valuable service to the country, and they are entitled to full pay, which includes allowances.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then does not this bill mean, brought down to an exact point, an increase of the pay of twenty officers of the Army?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is doubling the pay of twenty officers of the Army, under an arrangement sending them out over the country to these colleges. I hope, with this explanation, and with the additional knowledge we now have that they draw pay and can receive additional compensation from the colleges themselves, that we shall reject the bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I am glad to find that the Senators begin to understand this bill. The Senator from Ohio has stated the fact truly, that this bill is intended, when officers are detailed for this service in colleges, that they shall have the same pay that they would have if they had not been retired. There are a dozen words that I could put in there—that they shall have "full retired pay," or say that they shall have "pay proper," or you may say "pay without allowances." I am sure that the Senate does not intend that these gentlemen shall go into the service of these colleges and take the full pay of officers in active service and get compensation from the colleges also. My desire is that they shall be rendered useful to the country, and that they shall receive the pay they now have as retired officers, and shall also receive such compensation for their usefulness as presidents or professors of colleges as the institutions choose to give them. That is perfectly plain to me; and if the Senate understand it in that way let them put in any of the words I have suggested. If not, if you intend to say that these gentlemen the moment they are detailed shall receive the same pay that they would receive if they were assigned to service in the line of duty with their regiments or brigades, be it so; I am liberal enough toward the Army to give them almost anything you like.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to the Senator to strike out the word "full" before "pay" and insert "proper."

Mr. CAMERON. I am willing to do that or anything that will accomplish the purpose; but let us understand what the bill means. These men will be better off in this service than they are now as retired officers, where they only get the pay proper. I would allow them to render such services as they are capable of performing to these institutions, and receive such compensation as the institutions choose to give them.

Mr. FOWLER. I am of the opinion that these officers, if they are detailed for this purpose, should have all the pay they would get if they were in the Army. I see no reason why we should cut short their pay at all. If the Government has in its service a body of men for whom it has no use whatever, and details them for the purpose of instruction in the colleges of the country, in my judgment it ought to pay them the same as if they were in the Army. If it has use for these officers for Army purposes it had better devote them exclusively to Army uses. I understand that it cannot use them in that way, that we have more officers than we want. I think so. We have altogether more Army than we need.

While I attribute to these gentlemen the very highest qualifications and the very highest scientific attainments, I am opposed to making all the institutions of the country military institutions. I do not think that the Congress of the United States could do a worse thing than to foster such institutions in the country. I do not believe that there was any cause that tended more actively to bring on the rebellion in the southern States than the institution of a large number of military schools of this kind there. It fostered in that portion of the country an undue military spirit; and such will be the case through the whole country under this bill. We have too much martial spirit in the United States; and for that reason we ought to discourage this kind of education entirely. It is not the kind of education that the spirit of the age and the spirit of civilization require. The fewer wars we have the better. There is very little ever gained by any war; and certainly there is nothing gained by war that cannot be gained by peaceable means. Therefore I am opposed to the whole bill, and will move to lay it on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I was about to move to lay the bill on the table. I have several other bills that I desire to have acted upon, and we have sacrificed enough time already on this one.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will wait for a few moments.

Mr. WILSON. Look at the time and see what we have to do. We shall lose all our other bills if this debate continues.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I think by common consent this bill is to be laid on the table, and in that event I desire to call up a bill from the Military Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move to lay the bill on the table?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2003) to authorize the county commissioners of Ada county, Idaho, to select a site for a territorial prison, and the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2004) establishing the term of office of the house of representatives, and providing for biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

GEORGE W. SHORT.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I now move to take up House bill No. 1878.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1878) for the relief of George W. Short. It directs the Paymaster General to pay to George W. Short, late captain of company D, sixty-third regiment of Illinois volunteers, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, three months pay proper of a captain of infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEONIDAS SMITH.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I now move to take up House bill No. 1280.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1280) for the relief of Lieutenant Leonidas Smith, late of the twenty-second regiment Indiana volunteer infantry. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and allow to Lieutenant Leonidas Smith, late of company K, twenty-second regiment Indiana volunteer infantry, the full pay and allowances of a first lieutenant in the active service in the Army in the late war, from the 28th of February, 1863, to the 23d of January, 1864, in full payment for unpaid salary and allowances for that period of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was an amendment reported to this bill, which will be read.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I withdraw the amendment, so that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. A. WHITE.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1868.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1868) for the relief of H. A. White. It directs the Paymaster General to pay to H. A. White, late captain of company C, third regiment of North Carolina mounted infantry, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full pay and allowances of a captain of infantry from October 15, 1864, to August 8, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take up House bill No. 424.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 424) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It repeals so much of the second section of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men," approved the 28th of February, 1867, as provides that the section "shall apply only to claims received at the War Department prior to its passage;" but all claims under the second section of that act are to be presented and filed within two years from the date of the final passage of this act, and not afterwards.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY INSTRUCTORS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to give way for a moment to enable me to call up the bill (H. R. No. 1490) to define the pay of officers of the Army detailed to act as military instructors, that we may pass it by general consent with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I think there is no objection to it, and I hope it will be allowed to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) Does the Senator from Vermont submit a motion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir; I submit a motion to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would not be exactly right after the two Senators from Pennsylvania have gone out of the Chamber to take up the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Does the Senator from Ohio object?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is not fair. I object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the bill has not been treated fairly for an hour and a half.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of the bill; but as two Senators who opposed it have left the Chamber supposing that it had gone over, I do not think it would be exactly right to take it up again in their absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the motion to be withdrawn.

WIDOWS OF GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up House bill No. 1741.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1741) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman. The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Emily B. Bidwell, widow of the late Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, for a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 19th of October, 1864, on which day General Bidwell fell mortally wounded at the battle of Cedar Creek, Virginia, to continue during widowhood. The pension heretofore allowed her under general law is to be discontinued; but the sum received by her under it is to be deducted from the pension hereby granted. The bill also directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah Hackleman, widow of the late Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, for a pension, at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 3d day of October, 1862, on which day General Hackleman fell mortally wounded at the battle of Corinth, to continue during her widowhood. The pension heretofore allowed her under general law is to be discontinued; but the sum received by her under it is to be deducted from the pension hereby granted. The pensions hereby granted are to be subject to the provisions of the general pension law, except as to the amount as above provided for. The bill also proposes to repeal an act entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman," approved July 27, 1868.

Mr. WILSON. I offer an amendment—and this is all I have for to-night—to add as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Mrs. Sallie Griffin, widow of the late General Griffin, United States Army, whose name is now on the list of pensioners, the sum of fifty dollars per month during her widowhood, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not want to debate this bill. I wish to inquire whether it is reported in accordance with the rules on the subject of pensions in regard to the amount which is to be allowed in the particular cases?

Mr. WILSON. The bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and that committee took the subject under consideration, and then reported the bill back and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and we reported the bill under those circumstances.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not wish to oppose a pension bill; but I do not think it will answer to break down a general rule, and pass a bill allowing as a pension to one or two widows an amount which is not in accordance with the ordinary rule. If we do that for these persons we shall have to change the whole system of pensions, at least as to officers of this grade. I do not think we ought to pass this bill in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions without some information in regard to the effect that will be produced by it.

Mr. WILSON. I will say frankly to the Senator that the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who is not here, was opposed to the passage of this bill which came from the House, or to the bill as amended, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and reported by them. Some six or seven similar cases have passed during the last four or five years.

Mr. ANTHONY. There can be but very few persons to whom this principle can ever apply—only to the widows of brigadier generals who have died in the service—and I think the precedent is not at all dangerous.

Mr. FERRY. I do not see why there may not be widows of other officers besides brigadier generals. I remember when this bill came before the Senate from the Pension Committee there was an extreme reluctance on the part of Senators to resist bills of this kind, and yet at the same time the objection was made. The ground of the increase of pension then was that the officer was killed in battle. That was the sole ground made at the last session for this increase of pension beyond the ordinary law; and it was said if the fact that an officer is killed in battle is a reason for the increase of pension to his widow, then let it be done by some general law, and not select individual cases. It seems that since then the opinion of the Committee on Pensions being adverse to this species of legislation, the tone of the Senate at that time being adverse to this species of legislation, the bills have somehow got away from the Pension Committee, for they were originally two bills, and have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I confess I do not like this species of legislation.

Mr. ANTHONY. The reason why the Committee on Pensions declined to recommend these bills was because the Committee on Pensions recommend bills only according to the law. Where there are cases where the applicants do not fall within the letter of the law, but come clearly within its spirit, the Committee on Pensions report bills. Now the law allows no pension higher than thirty dollars a month; but there have been several cases where the widows of brigadier generals have received a pension of fifty dollars a month. I think the chairman of the Committee on Pensions himself would be in favor of a general law, I certainly should be, increasing the pensions of this grade of pensioners, of whom there are very few, up to fifty dollars a month. I see no reason why this bill should not pass; and if there are other cases—they must be few—I see no reason why they should not pass also.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The law grades the pensions of officers, commencing with the lowest rank and going by five dollars a grade up to thirty dollars, which reaches to a lieutenant colonel; and all officers higher than a lieutenant colonel get the same. It is similar in the Navy, except that the grades are a little different for the same names of officers. I think the rate for a lieutenant in the Navy is the highest in the naval service. However, that is not material to this discussion.

These bills have from time to time been sent to the Pension Committee, who have, since my connection with it, uniformly refused to entertain them on the ground that their business is properly confined to ascertaining whether the party is entitled to a pension, and if they find that he is so entitled to a pension they can only give properly the pension which the law fixes; and to ask anything beyond the regular rate of pension is to ask as it were a gratuity or a reward for extra services. This would bring these bills here; the parties themselves and their friends come to me and talk to me about the very eminent services of the deceased, about his great sufferings, great losses, and great sacrifices perhaps. I can only tell them that we have nothing to do with that, nor should we. If a man is to be allowed for extra military services it is most certainly the province of the Military Committee to consider it and judge of it. We are not supposed to have the information officially which enables us to judge in such cases, and we do not like to take the function upon ourselves.

Then, there is another reason. If we do this in one case we are making distinctions which perhaps we have no right to make, unless the case should be very strong or very different from the ordinary run; and we should not feel ourselves, even if the matter was referred to us for the purpose, at liberty to make these distinctions. It may be said that one general has been extraordinarily successful, while another has not fought so many battles or won so many victories; but we have reason to believe that all these men discharged their duties, and then of course there should be no distinction. Where we have every reason to believe that a man has devoted all his skill, all his time, and everything that goes to make a soldier to accomplishing his duties, he has discharged his full duty, and we cannot make a distinction between two officers who have equally well discharged their duty although the successes of one may have been more brilliant than those of the other.

At the last session there was before the Senate a general pension bill making several amendments and alterations in the law. This same question was up then. Bills had been referred to the Military Committee, and I suggested, I believe, to the chairman of the Military Committee to test the sense of the Senate on the question by offering an amendment to increase the rate of pensions according to rank, giving a colonel thirty-five dollars a month, and so on until the brigadier general would get fifty dollars. The Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Military Committee, did propose that amendment in the Senate. Some discussion ensued, and I believe on the suggestion of Senators around him and all over the Chamber, perhaps, it was withdrawn. The Committee on Pensions can take that for nothing but an instruction to them that they are not to report bills of this kind. The Senate refuses to do it as a general arrangement, and of course we acquiesce in that. If the Senate does not think fit to make a general allowance of fifty dollars to the widow of a brigadier or major general, we cannot consider that we have a right to do it in an individual case. In no case has the committee intended to cast any slur whatever on the deceased by its action on these applications. They have all been applications for widows. On the other hand in some cases we have esteemed them very highly. There is one bill before the Military Committee now which at the request of the applicant I had referred to the Military Committee, where I knew the deceased and have had several interviews with the widow, and I could say not one word against him or her; on the contrary if I did say anything, it would be in praise of both of them as being as worthily entitled to any benefaction the Senate had to give as any other persons. But we have found it necessary to adopt a principle. If we go on and give a higher pension to a common soldier, to a lower officer or a high officer than he is entitled to by law, we open the door to a thousand applications, and every pensioner would consider himself entitled to come back upon us and increase his pension. Unless, therefore, some very extraordinary reasons are shown for it I think it ought not to be done, and those extraordinary reasons must consist in extra services, something more than all of the same class and grade performed.

Mr. CONKLING. This bill was passed once, and was approved on the 27th of July, 1868. It failed to be executed by an accident which was exactly this; the bill provided: "But the sum received by her under the same shall be deducted from the pension hereby granted; and this pension shall be subject to the provisions of the general pension law." The Commissioner held that he must commence by putting up all the pension received, taking the whole time it had run, and that the total of that sum in money must be paid back by the claimant to begin with before this law could operate. In other words he held that there was a repugnance on the face of the statute, and therefore it comes here again simply in consequence of the accident that having been passed by the two Houses of Congress and approved it failed of execution for that reason.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now, I should like to hear the bill read once more.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have not a word to say in relation to this case; but I presented a claim before Congress in behalf of a widow who lost her husband in battle and also her son, and she was unable to procure a pension of fifty dollars, and I see not why this bill should pass if that is to be ignored.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call attention to the fact that the pension in one of these cases commences five years back and in the other seven years, at the rate of fifty dollars a month; that this bill is not to execute the act passed at the last session at all; it includes other cases not covered by that act.

Mr. CONKLING. The same cases?

Mr. BUCKALEW. There are three here. There is a third pension case here.

Mr. CONKLING. That has been put in since.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on Pensions have examined these subjects with great care; of course not with the ability that the Military Committee possess, but with as much faithfulness, I feel bound to say; and we have been unable to see why the widows of brigadier generals should have any greater pension, out of proportion to the pay of their husbands, which is the basis of what the pension law gives them already, than the widows of colonels or captains or soldiers whose children are just as necessitous and whose wants are just as great. I hope the Senator will not insist upon passing an omnibus bill of that kind to-night, but let us lay it over and consider it. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope this bill will not be postponed. If this were the commencement of this system perhaps the proposition of the Senator from Vermont would be right, but this results from the fact that a subject proper for the consideration of the Pension Committee has been referred at former sessions to the Military Committee, and of course the same policy and rules that govern the regular Pension Committee do not govern the Military Committee. They do not feel themselves under the same restraints of the general policy of the law that the Pension Committee do. There have been pensions allowed to the widows of brigadier generals of fifty dollars a month. Congress has deliberately done this in, I think, at least four cases before these two or three cases were considered; perhaps more than four cases. It may have been right or it may have been wrong; I am not now discussing that; but we have provided fifty dollars as the pension for the widow of a brigadier general in several cases.

I know much of the circumstances of the case of Mrs. Hackleman. General Hackleman was a lawyer in fine practice in a rich county in Indiana. From his profession he was realizing to himself and his family a very handsome competency. He volunteered; and from one grade to another he became a brigadier general. He was a man of marked talent, and I believe was quite successful in the new profession of arms, fought well and died, leaving this widow and a family, I think, altogether of girls; no member of the family upon whom she could lean for support. She has since his death been compelled to support herself by her own efforts, perhaps—I think in keeping a boarding house. Her husband was not very provident, because from his profession he knew that he could realize very handsomely, and he invested very much of his means in a handsome residence; so that it resulted after his death that she had this handsome house in which to live, but nothing upon which she could provide for herself and her daughters.

If there be any case in which it was proper to give a pension of fifty dollars, I apprehend that no Senator will question that the widow of General Hackleman is a proper case, and I should not wish a discrimination made against her. While we give fifty dollars to other widows of brigadier generals I insist that the same shall be given to Mrs. Hackleman.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the argument of my friend from Indiana seems to proceed upon the basis that if we have taken one step in the path of injustice to the whole class of widows and orphans of this rebellion we must take similar steps and continue to go wrong. Now, I do not stand up here to say that Mrs. Hackleman, so far as she is concerned, ought not to have fifty dollars a month or one hundred dollars a month. A thousand dollars a month will not make her good for her loss. Nobody disputes any such proposition as that; but I stand up for the whole body of the widows and orphans of this war who are as respectable and as needy and as sorrowful as this lady, to whom we say, if a private soldier's widow, "you can have eight dollars or ten dollars," whatever the rate is per month, "and no more." Their tears have been just as bitter, their sufferings are just as great, as those of the widows of brigadier generals who have, as my friend says his particular constituent has, a handsome house to live in.

If the country was rich enough to pay the debt of gratitude that it owes to the memory of these soldiers, and to pay the debt of duty as far as it has the means of paying it to the widows and orphans of these soldiers, I would go not only for paying the widows of brigadier generals fifty dollars a month, but for paying all other soldiers' widows whatever was necessary to make them and their children comfortable, no matter how much the sum might be; but we all know that that cannot be done, and that every dollar in excess that we pay to the widows of high officers, ladies in respectable and influential positions who can get the ear of Senators at any time in the marble room, is so much really that better belongs to this poorer, more needy, and as sorrowful body of widows and orphans who cover the land who are in greater want than they are. That, in my opinion, is the argument, not because I should be opposed to giving to these particular widows, if we were able to do it, all that they want; but in doing that to them we are committing a great injustice toward those who need more and who deserve as much.

I agree that it is not right to give to five widows and not give to others; but if it was wrong, as I am satisfied it was, to give this large rate to the widows to whom we have given it, it is no argument to me to say you must continue to do wrong until you can raise the whole pension-list by allowing the widows of soldiers and petty officers and officers in the line a greater pension than they now get according to their needs. I am opposed to going a single step or paying a single dollar more than the same ratable proportion under the law to the widows of the higher officers.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, whenever we change this system of pensions we ought to do it by a general law. I have no objection to giving the widow of every general who died on the battle-field, or who died at home in consequence of his services on the battle-field, a pension of fifty dollars a month, but I will not agree to that until you give it to them all. Last year I objected to two or three of these cases that were sought to be put through by appeals to the sympathies of Senators who have great influence in this body, because, in my judgment, the proposition is wrong. Last year, when I went up into Columbia county, where my colleague lives, I found a highly-educated woman sewing for her living, and she said to me that her neighbors had bought her a sewing-machine. I knew her years ago when her husband and she were prosperous; he was a wagon maker. He had three children when the war began. She was a highly-educated woman, fitted to go into any society in this country. In the enthusiasm of his patriotism he started out as a private soldier, as thousands of others did. He served for two or three years and was killed in battle. She applied to some lawyer in the neighborhood and she got eight dollars a month pension. She was just as fitted for the best society as the wife of any major general in the country, but she was poor, and she had three children, and she had to take what she could get. Why should she not have fifty dollars? If her husband had been killed on a railroad she would have got at least an income of $300 a year, for in such a case in our State there would be no difficulty in getting five or ten thousand dollars for the life of a vigorous, active, and intelligent man that had a family. But he is killed in the service of his country, and she gets eight dollars a month and nobody thinks about her, because her husband was a private soldier! And yet in his home he was just as respectable, just as influential in the pursuits of life as anybody around him. His trade was that of a mechanic, but he had the education of our public schools and he was an educated man; he was a useful man in every way. Now, this general could not have been more than that, although he was a lawyer, and why should the wife of a lawyer who goes to the war for any motive, the best motive you like, if he happens to be killed, have more compensation than the wife of a wagon-maker? Does not a man who makes wagons and plows do as much for the world as the man who lives in his office, sometimes is learned and often not, and who gets his compensation without as much labor either of brain or body as the honest mechanic? I am in favor of this bill if you add all; and I am willing to make a motion that the widow of every brigadier general who died in battle or from wounds received in battle shall have fifty dollars a month, and that the widow of every private soldier who died in battle or from wounds received in battle shall have twenty dollars. I am willing to take that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Pennsylvania would have some force if the allowance that is to be made to Mrs. Hackleman was to be taken from the allowance that is made to the soldier's widow.

Mr. CAMERON. It is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does not the soldier's widow get her allowance whether this allowance passes or not?

Mr. CAMERON. She gets eight dollars and the other fifty dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Pennsylvania was once Secretary of War. Why did not he think of it when he was Secretary of War to say to Congress that the lawyer is no better than the wagon-maker, and that if the lawyer becomes a brigadier general it is not right that he should have $5,000 a year and the wagon-maker only thirteen dollars a month?

Mr. CAMERON. Allow me to say just one word there. The Secretary of War in 1861 did for the first time in the history of his country recommend that every man who would go to the war should have a bounty of $100 paid to him. It was the first time it was ever done.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator thinks that is the first time it was ever done; I think a bounty was allowed in the Mexican war.

Mr. CAMERON. No; not like that. No bounty was given in the Mexican war except land, which was moved also by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think there was a bounty in money allowed in the Mexican war, but I am perfectly willing to concede cheerfully to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he did recommend that liberal allowance of $100 for the wagon-maker and his associates.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from Pennsylvania moved also compensation to soldiers of the Mexican war—a quarter of a section of land to each.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is all right now. But the Secretary of War then and Senator now did leave the difference between the brigadier and the soldier.

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The difference that has always been observed, that the brigadier shall have high pay, honor, and advantages and that the soldier shall have his thirteen or sixteen dollars a month. Why that difference? It may be arbitrary, but it has always been made; and when you speak of compensating the brigadier by three or four hundred dollars a month does the Senator from Pennsylvania bring it up that the wagon-maker, who is a private soldier, gets but sixteen dollars a month? Why this difference? There is no greater difference proposed between the brigadier's widow by this bill and the soldier's widow than the honorable Senator as Secretary of War recognized between the brigadier and the soldier, now both dead.

Mr. DRAKE. Not so much.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, not near so much. Thirteen dollars a month is scarcely perceived in the compensation of a brigadier general; and then, after it is all paid, the brigadier carries off the glories of the battle when it is won. Public sentiment and the laws of the country both recognize this difference. It may be wrong; but the difference between the commander and the soldier was recognized before this Government established it. Perhaps it is necessary. I am not going to be called off by the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania to discuss that. This distinction is recognized and he proposes to recognize it now. If he thinks the Treasury can afford to pay to the widows of soldiers who died in the service twenty dollars a month, and the committee come to that conclusion, I will vote with them if that be right and we can afford it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can we afford it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not investigated the subject. I know that the Treasury can pay the half dozen more widows of brigadiers and not be disturbed by it $600 a year—to a widow whose husband was making as many thousand dollars when he entered the service. Whether the Senator wishes to recognize the difference between the lawyer and the wagon-maker or not in this debate in the Senate the fact did exist that the lawyer could make much money by his profession; and he abandoned it, he went into the service, and he died in the service and left his widow poor. She had been accustomed to the habits of life which his income as a lawyer brought and secured. Now, why not make her comfortable? Six hundred dollars a year! There are not many of these widows, I understand there are only very few, whose husbands were brigadiers who died in battle, perhaps not more than three or four more. If I am mistaken it can be corrected. The statement was made as to the number last session, but I cannot recollect just now the number. I was astonished how few there were of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend a question, whether he means to argue that we can pay the widows of brigadiers more because they are few, and that we must deny to the widows of captains and of private soldiers what they ought to have because they are many?

Mr. HENDRICKS rose.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator will allow me to say that I think the chairman of the committee knows that there are about four hundred.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, no.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think there were ninety brigadiers and major generals killed in the war.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Leaving widows?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know about that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the chairman of the committee if he has informed himself on the subject of the number.

Mr. WILSON. It is impossible to tell how many of the widows of brigadier and major generals who died in the service during the war will ever make any application of the kind. In my State nine general officers died and twenty-five others were wounded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many line officers from your State?

Mr. WILSON. There were sixteen hundred in all killed and wounded; about four hundred died. There have been five cases, I believe, during the war, where we have granted this rate of pension, and this bill adds three more. There have been I think quite a number of applications, but some of these general officers left their widows in good condition, comfortable in regard to the means of support; others left them in a destitute condition. This increase has only been given in very hard cases. There have been five cases I think in all, and this bill will add three more if it shall pass. I admit the fact that it is a doubtful thing and appeals a good deal to our feelings, and our judgment is somewhat against it. We reported the bill with a good deal of reluctance.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not going to take up more time in discussing this matter. I have done my duty to this widow. General Hackleman was my professional friend; I knew him very well; I met him often in the court-house; I respected him for his ability; I knew his value to his family; I know that there is no soldier who fought under him who returned with the loss of an arm or a leg, and there is no widow of a soldier who fought under General Hackleman, that will think hard of the Senate of the United States for giving his widow this little allowance.

Mr. BUCKALEW. My objection to this bill is well illustrated by the speech of the Senator from Indiana. If we are to take up special bills outside of general rules either imposed by law or by the practice of committees, their passage will depend upon the accident of whether an effective appeal shall be made to the Senate by some member on behalf of the claimant upon our bounty. If some person, like the Senator from Indiana, who has the ear of the members, will tell us some affecting particulars of the deceased or of his widow, and it is understood that we are to pass bills of this kind, of course he will win; we shall pass his bill, and after a little we shall find that we shall have to go over our pension system and raise whole classes, perhaps nearly double, as in the case here, going up from thirty to fifty dollars a month. That is the only reason why I stand up to object to this bill, because this system is one which we dare not venture upon with regard to the public interests and our own duty.

Now, Mr. President, the objection is not that the widows of brigadiers get more than the widows of private soldiers. That is not the point of objection. That is our system. The objection is that you propose to select out the widows of brigadiers and give them increased pay, whereas you do not propose to do that with more humble persons. If I should call up a bill here to-night to increase the pension of the widow of some private soldier from eight dollars to fifteen dollars a month I should be laughed at; at all events I could not get any votes in the Senate.

Mr. FOWLER. I should vote with you.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The votes would not be adequate to pass it, although the Senator from Tennessee might vote with me.

Mr. President, nowhere upon the face of the earth are such amounts of money paid by Government to men who have served it and to the widows and children of men who have served it as we pay in this country to our soldiers. The amounts are huge. Look over our legislation; see what burdens our people have voluntarily taken upon themselves; see how your tax-collectors reach out to every man in the country and demand his contribution to meet the requirements of this system. It is done cheerfully; and why? Because the people feel that your system is one of equality and justice. You have pension laws which extend the same measure of public bounty to all. When it comes to be understood, however, that you have no equal system, that it depends upon the feelings of the moment, upon a warm appeal in Congress in favor of individuals whether these pensions shall be granted or not, you will find complaint; a sense of injustice will come to all people who contribute to you the means by which you meet the demands of this pension system; and besides that all persons in those classes of pensions who are not favored will feel that Government is not dealing justly by them, and instead of your pension system being one of which you can boast and be proud you will have one not only of inequality but of unpopularity; one of which the people will complain, and justly complain.

Now, what do we do to those ladies who are before us? We pay to each of them every day of the year one dollar out of the taxes of the people of the United States. Can we afford to pay more? If we can, introduce your bill and let the Pension Committee tell us so, and let us vote the money in a proper manner; but do not permit any person to come here individually and ask to be taken out of a common class, and by favoritism, by feelings of friendship or of kindness at the moment, be placed in an invidious position, and to get from the public money a contribution which is not given to others standing in the same relations to the Government.

Mr. President, this thing grows. A year ago, it is said, some bill got through in a bungling way and the expected fruits of that legislation were not realized. Now, a bill in an improved form is introduced here for that case; and it goes back five years, commencing in 1864. What next? Here is another case going back to 1862; that is put into the bill and now constitutes part of it. What more? There is a third case, a Mrs. Griffin, whose husband was not killed in battle at all, but who died of disease, died of a fever; that case is added.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will allow me to say that General Griffin died of disease contracted in the service, and died as much a martyr to his country as though he had died by a bullet. He stayed there at the peril of his life.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am coming to that. The idea of confining this legislation to persons who were killed in battle is all idle. Is there not as much merit in behalf of the widow of a brigadier general who died of disease? Of course there is, and the case is in the bill; and the Senator from Rhode Island springs promptly to his feet to vindicate its being put there; and why is it not just as good a case where a widow comes and tells us that her husband died, perhaps years after the war was over, of a disease which he contracted or hardships which he underwent in the war? Of course he is on just as good a footing as the other, and so you can draw no line at all. The objection lies against this system of legislation, taking up individual cases and then attempting to control yourself by any rule. You cannot do it. It is all a matter of personal appeal and of personal feeling. The only ground of justice and of safety is to proceed by general and equal laws. If our pension laws are not liberal enough let them be amended; but let us not under any circumstances venture outside of the laws which have been enacted upon this subject and attempt to administer a system not merely rude, but a most imperfect and odious thing.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am very much disposed to concur in the views expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat. Legislation ought always to proceed upon principle. Legislation should always be uniform in its subjects and in its principles of operation. It is impossible to discriminate in laws between individuals belonging to the same class.

Mr. CAMERON. Will my good friend from Kentucky allow me to move an adjournment? It is after half past ten o'clock, and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock in. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. O. B. Bennett.

The Journal of yesterday was read in part, when

Mr. POLAND moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATURE OF MONTANA.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States a bill (H. R. No. 2004) establishing the term of office of the house of representatives and providing for biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly of Montana; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides that hereafter the members of the house of representatives of the Territory of Montana shall be elected for the term of two years, and the stated sessions of the Legislative Assembly shall be biennial; and the said Legislative Assembly, at its first session after the passage of this act, shall provide by law for carrying this act into effect.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, reported adversely from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads upon the following bills; which, together with the accompanying report, were laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1689) for the construction of lines of telegraph between Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington under the direction of the Post Office Department;

A bill (H. R. No. 1504) to establish telegraph lines between Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington;

A bill (H. R. No. 1415) to incorporate the United States postal telegraph, and to establish a postal telegraph system; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the construction of a Government telegraph under the direction of the Post Office Department between New York and Boston.

FORT COLLINS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2005) declaring the lands constituting the Fort Collins military reservation, in the Territory of Colorado, subject to preemption and homestead entry, as provided for in existing laws; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the lands constituting the Fort Collins military reservation, in the Territory of Colorado, so far as the same have not been lawfully disposed of since their reservation, shall be restored to the United States and made subject to preemption and homestead entry as now provided for by law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with various acts of Congress, lists of clerks and other employes in the several bureaus of his Department during 1868, their salaries, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SAC AND FOX TRUST LANDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to House resolution of the 13th instant, a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, relative to the Sac and Fox Indian trust lands; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HAMBURG HORTICULTURAL EXHIBITION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture, relative to a proposed international horticultural exhibition to be held at Hamburg, September, 1869, recommending the sending of a commission, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. YOUNG asked and obtained leave to have published in the debates remarks upon affairs in Georgia. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations are very anxious that the House shall resume this morning as soon as possible the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill; and under the instructions of that committee I shall have to insist on the regular order.

PUBLIC CREDIT—COIN CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes, as the regular order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who reported the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, is entitled to one hour in which to close the debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, having already addressed the House on this subject I am disposed to afford other gentlemen as much opportunity as possible to express their views. There is one fact, however, of which I wish to remind the House. The bill consists of two sections: one pledging the faith of the Government to pay its securities according to what is understood to be the right interpretation of the contract, the other relating to the legalization and enforcement of coin contracts in accordance with the recent decision of the Supreme Court. In order that gentlemen who are in favor of one of these sections and opposed to the other may have an opportunity to express their views by their votes, I have allowed two amendments to be offered: one to strike out the first section, the other to strike out the second section. These amendments are first to be voted on, and gentlemen will have an opportunity to place themselves upon the record upon each proposition separately, though I hope both sections will prevail. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, on a previous occasion I submitted to the House some remarks on the legal-tender act of 1862, and on the question of our public debt. In the ten minutes now allotted me it will be impossible for me to go over that ground again, and for my general views upon those questions I must refer to what I have heretofore said. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] announced his intention to speak on this subject, and said to the House at the beginning of his remarks that he did not mean to discuss the question of finance generally, but to confine himself strictly to the bill before the House, I supposed we should hear some reason for the adoption of the first section of the bill. But to my surprise the gentleman appeared here with a labored treatise on the finances of the country, in which he gave statements as to the crops of the South, cotton and other crops, and dealt largely in generalities in stating to the House the object he had in view in the first section of this act. Let me have his attention for a moment; and first, I should like to know what he means by this declaration in the bill:

That the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

What does he mean by that? Does he mean that any existing statute should be changed? Does he mean to say that the act of 1862—the legal-tender act, to which I suppose this is directed, and the issue of five-twenty bonds under that act—does he mean to say that that act does not provide for the payment of five-twenty bonds in coin, and therefore a statute of this kind ought to be enacted?

Mr. SCHENCK. Does the gentleman want a reply?

Mr. PRUYN. Not now, but when the gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot answer at any other time, for I have given all my time away. If the gentleman had done me the honor to read my speech he would have known I have replied to every one of his inquiries.

Mr. PRUYN. I listened to it as attentively as I could when it was delivered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am sorry that I was not understood.

Mr. PRUYN. I will confess to my mind the gentleman did not meet the point at all. What do we mean by this legislation? Do we mean anything or nothing? Is it a renewed declaration of what former statutes provide or something else? If the former it is deceptive, and so I look upon it; but if it is the latter, then the gentleman undertakes by this law to create a new obligation on the part of the Government to its creditors, such as the acts under which the issue of bonds was made did not create.

Now, sir, this whole question will eventually be solved in one way. If the gentleman is of the opinion that in 1862, when the bonds of 1862 will have matured, the Government will then have resumed specie payment, the whole question is then solved, for we will then pay coin, of course. The labor, the industry, and the toil of the country must work out this problem; but if, when that time arrives, we cannot pay in coin, if we shall not have reached coin value, then we must pay in new obligations, and the public creditor must wait until the country is able to meet its obligations in coin. We stated to the world that we meant to carry on the war not upon a specie basis, that we were not able to carry on the war with coin, but we intended to draw on posterity and the labor of the future. We promised gold for interest, but that the public creditors must take the result as to the principal; that if we put down the rebellion, if we succeeded in that work, we should soon resume specie payment, and then, of course, every obligation of the Government, would be paid in coin. If we did not reach that point, then it would be impossible for us to pay in coin, and the public creditors must take new obligations and wait until we could reach specie payment. That was the proposition we made in 1862 to the public creditors, and under which they took those bonds.

Now, sir, what has been the cause of our expenditure since the war closed? We are more indebted now than we were then, notwithstanding a system of taxation more heavy than was ever before imposed upon any people living under a republican form of government. Notwithstanding these drafts upon our resources our debt has been accumulating, and we are further from specie payment than three years ago; and so it will be until we have a sound system of finance on the part of the Government—a sound system of taxation on one side levied on a few articles, and a wise system of expenditure on the other. Until we do that we shall have to give the public creditors renewed promises to pay. On the other hand a wise, sound, and judicious system of finance can bring us to specie payments in a very few years. But Congress can do nothing by legislation of this kind. It is futile, it is useless, it is deceptive. The first section of this bill, so far as I can see, means nothing. If it means more than the former statutes do, then I submit that this is not the way to meet that question. If this Government is to come under increased and enlarged obligations, this whole thing should be fairly and squarely considered in open debate, giving an opportunity to all gentlemen to advance their respective views in regard to it, and we should determine by conjoint effort in what way we can best protect the credit and power of the country.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot enlarge on some points connected with this matter, and that so important a matter must be disposed of under such pressing circumstances. But I felt bound to say this much in regard to it, and to express the hope that the first section of this act will be stricken out; and that with regard to the second section, while it may be well enough to pass it, there is really no need of it. But I do not know that there is any substantial objection to it. The decision of the Supreme Court has fortunately put us right on this subject, and I do not think that this House can supplement anything to the Constitution by its action on this subject. There are other views in regard to the matter that I would like to present, but I see my time is exhausted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, the tax-payers of this country demand that their burdens be lessened. They have proved in the past, as I think they will in the future, that they are ready to respond to all that the wants and necessities of the Government actually required at their hands. And while this feeling of patriotism prompts them to furnish all the means necessary to sustain their Government, they demand an economical disbursement of those means thus furnished, and that this Congress determine, so far as possible, in what manner the burdens of taxation can be reduced.

It is said, and truly said, that the first method is by a judicious and proper economy in the appropriations, the limitations of these appropriations to such objects and purposes as are absolutely necessary and essential to the existence of the Government. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that career has been entered upon by this Congress, and the reports of the Committee on Appropriations show that we shall, for the next fiscal year, disburse only about two hundred and ninety million dollars, about one hundred and fifty million dollars of which sum is to be applied to the payment of interest upon our various forms of indebtedness. That is a large reduction upon any former yearly expenditure. If the same spirit of economy continues we shall soon reach a point when no expenditure shall be made beyond the necessities I have before referred to. Such is my confidence in the patriotism and honesty of the people that I believe no exigencies can arise which involves the good faith and honor of the country but what they will respond with their means to the fullest extent necessary. Show the necessity and the action will be prompt and effectual.

Having entered upon the career of retrenchment we must pursue it to the end, for the purpose of relieving the tax-payer. And the rejection of all subsidies and grants looking to private interest at the expense of the public purse shows clearly the tone and temper of this House. The question is now before the nation whether there is any other mode in which we can be relieved of a portion of these burdens, and at the same time act in perfect good faith to all of our creditors. Mr. Speaker, we are paying a higher rate of interest than any nation on the globe that has equal resources to meet its obligations. We have more resources in proportion to our population, when compared with the amount of our indebtedness, than any nation. These resources have been and are being developed with a rapidity that is unparalleled in history. Why, then, is it, I ask members of this House, that to-day while European nations borrow money at three or three and a half per cent. interest we are compelled to pay six per cent. on all the loans we have made? Is it because any one doubts our ability to meet our obligations? No, sir. We are the only nation on the globe that has ever discharged in full its national debt. It is our history, and we are entitled to be proud of it. All know that we can meet our obligations, and that the spirit which carried us through the rebellion which has just closed will carry us through any financial necessities that honesty and honor may demand.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know what the gentleman means by saying that we are the only nation that has ever discharged its debt in full. I certainly do not understand what he means.

Mr. JUDD. The gentleman is extremely critical. I suppose he has faith in General Jackson; he ought to have. President Jackson, in his seventh annual message to Congress, says:

"Since my last annual communication all the remains of the public debt have been redeemed, or money has been placed in deposit for this purpose whenever the creditors choose to receive it."

This is what I mean when I say we have before paid our debts in full.

But to return to the point I was discussing. I was asking the question why it is that with resources conceded to be adequate to meet all the claims upon us we are now paying six per cent. interest on our interest-bearing debt, amounting in the aggregate to $150,000,000 per annum? I will tell you why, in my opinion, it is so. It is because we have thrown discredit upon our own obligations. It is because by our internal strife in politics we have thrown doubt upon our good faith. It is because some have pretended that if a creditor held our note for $1,000 bearing interest that we had a legal right to pay that with ten $100 notes not bearing interest. If between individuals such a transaction would not come within the definition of honesty, is the case changed when the Government does that or attempts to do it? We cannot pay our indebtedness now. If we desire to reduce our rate of interest we must have the money to pay the outstanding obligation and that must be borrowed. So long as a doubt remains as to the intentions and good faith of the nation no money can be borrowed, and the present rate of interest must continue to be paid.

It was said by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in opening this debate that faith in our intention to meet our obligations is the basis of all credit, a belief not only in our ability to pay, but in our disposition so to do; and I say very frankly that technical discussions as to the meaning of our undertaking when we promised to pay a dollar and the search after some way in which that obligation might be abridged is one of the great causes why our debt cannot be funded at four per cent., thus saving to the nation $50,000,000 per annum. I make no attack, Mr. Speaker, upon any person or party. I only refer to facts which are now a part of the history of this country, and the doubts occasioned thereby, that our discussions have shaken the faith of the public as to our securities, and until set at rest all hopes of reducing our rate of interest must be given up. Our ability to pay finally is undoubted. Place our faith beyond debate and cavil and this nation can command the money market of the world. Our five-twenties, bearing six per cent. interest, are payable at our pleasure after five years. When we can borrow money at four per cent. we are authorized by the terms of the contract to call in these obligations and stop the six per cent. interest. The purpose of the first section of this bill is to establish our credit by acting in good faith, and that done the result I have named follows. We discussed at the last session a funding bill, the purpose being to consolidate the debt and obtain a lower rate of interest, and in that mode and to that extent to relieve the people. All such laws will be useless until we are in condition to say and show that our income from honestly collected taxation exceeds our expenditures, and that our promise to pay is perfectly sure at all times and upon all occasions. It is perfectly evident from the estimates of income and the amount authorized to be expended that we are in a condition to comply with the first of my propositions. Shall the second be demonstrated without resort to technicalities and quibbles? When that is done the United States of America can borrow any amount of money to take up her outstanding high-interest-rated obligations and substitute therefor a lower rate of interest, and we can change our obligations from six per cent. to four per cent. It is said that no man will give up six per cent. obligations and take four per cent. obligations. It is no matter whether he desires to do so or not. The law allows us when we have the money to pay the five-twenties. We can order the holders to surrender them and get the money at the Treasury, and a failure to do so stops interest on them. Such are the express terms of the contract. Why, then, should we not save $50,000,000 per annum? It is worth struggling for; and to that end the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means has been proposed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRYOR] says that he does not see any object or purpose in this bill, and he asks the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] whether he intends to change the terms of the law. What are the terms of the law has been and is a disputed question. It has been in the arena of politics and party strife; good men have differed and demagogues howled vociferously, and while this controversy was going on among ourselves the man that is in condition to help you reduce your interest from six to four per cent. stands back and says I have your note for a dollar; if it does not mean a dollar I shall avoid getting any more of such stuff. The commercial laws of the world recognize coin as the standard of value, and the United States, as part of that whole, made and recognized a dollar a dollar in coin. Many of the laws under which five-twenties were issued were enacted before the legal-tender act; and they had in part been executed by the issue of bonds under them. Will the gentleman from New York make us believe that anything but coin was within the intent of the law-makers? My time will not allow me to discuss this question or endeavor to satisfy doubts. It is to avoid these doubts and thus enable us to be in condition to lighten taxation by reducing interest that I would have this law passed. Will the act be beneficial in producing this result? If so I am in favor of it. It is my firm belief that such will be the result. This House on Saturday last closed the business of Treasury brokerage, so far as its action could do it, by the taking from the Secretary of the Treasury all power to sell and buy bonds, settling thus the amount of our debt. The duty of wise statesmanship is to proceed with such legislation as will consolidate our debt at the lowest possible rate of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose it would be out of order in the discussion of this question to remind our friends on this side of the Hall, and with whom I act politically, that we are committed to the principles of this bill by the action of the convention that presented General Grant's name as the standard-bearer in the late political contest. In the declaration of principles will be found the following:

"That the national debt, contracted as it has been for the preservation of the Union for all time to come, should be extended over a fair period of redemption; and it is the duty of Congress to reduce the rate of interest thereon whenever it can be honestly done."

And again:

"That the best policy to diminish our burden of debt is to improve our credit, that capitalists will seek to loan us money at lower rates, of interest than we now pay, and must continue to pay so long as repudiation, partial or total, open or covert, is threatened or suspected."

I find that my convictions of what is both expedient and right are fully in accord with the principles enunciated by the party with which I acted politically, and I shall with pleasure give my vote for this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, so far as the first section of this bill is concerned, I have heard with great pleasure the words of my colleague from the Chicago district, [Mr. JUDD.] The people of Illinois, and I believe the people of every State in this Union, are determined that the war debt of the United States and every other public obligation of this country shall be paid in such manner as to reflect no dishonor whatever upon the Republic. Now, all the Government of the United States has to do is to make its promises for gold, its greenbacks, as good as gold, and the question which divided parties last year will be no more. It is true, in my opinion, that the speeches and arguments of distinguished gentlemen upon this floor, Republicans and Democrats, on the subject of paying off our greenbacks have cost this Government $50,000,000 a year, and will cost it that much until we have satisfied the world that our bonds mean just what an English bond means, and that is gold for gold.

The way to economize is to get money at a low rate of interest, and nothing will bring that about but the plan suggested by my colleague. It may be that the second section of this bill may have some effect in that direction. But take it all in all I do aver that I never will vote for any section in any bill that scales down the greenbacks of this country. This is not—and I commend this thought to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK]—this is not like a case in which the Government is legislating about bank notes. This currency is the work of the Government itself. And will this Government issue notes purporting to be a legal tender, and then, by your own legislative action, advertise the Government as bankrupt, by declaring that your notes are not as good as gold, and that you will do nothing to make them so? I am opposed to any such measure, come from what source it may.

And I am glad this opportunity is offered me to speak my mind about this matter, lest I should be compelled to vote without an explanation, as I did the other day upon the constitutional amendment. Rather than vote that this Government will consent for a moment that its money is not as good as gold and so considered I will vote against the whole bill.

I cannot sit down without further calling the attention of this House to the great importance of banishing and forever from the public mind the thought that this Government will ever quibble with its creditors by offering them paper of its own in place of gold, which paper it does not make equivalent to gold in their hands. They are paying to-day for the stump speeches which gave candidates for the Presidency their prominence last year at the rate, I believe, of $50,000,000 a year. And the tax-payers, Democrats and Republicans, are bound to struggle under this burden as long as we keep up the controversy whether we will make our credit good or not. This is all I have to say on this subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. AXTELL] for five minutes.

Mr. AXTELL. I propose to address the House at this time for the purpose of sustaining both sections of this bill. The first section provides that bonds of the United States, except where otherwise expressly provided for, shall be paid in gold and silver coin, which is simply equivalent to saying that the bonds shall be paid. And I think that this Congress should give no uncertain utterance before the world to that sentiment.

There is no payment of these bonds except in gold and silver. Payment does not mean that you shall take up a bond bearing interest and give in its place a note bearing no interest and irredeemable; but it means that you shall really pay the amount of the bond. And it is necessary that we, as the American Congress, shall go squarely and boldly before the world with no uncertain utterance upon this point.

The action of this Congress, commencing with its vote that the bonds should be paid, but five or six voting in the negative, has brought up the value of American securities twenty per cent., gold receding from 150 to 130, from which point it will probably never rise; or, in other words, American securities and legal-tender notes have gone up, for to say that gold rises and falls misleads the mind. Gold cannot rise and fall, in fact. But nominally it is quoted now at 132 and a fraction, and last autumn it was quoted at 150. But we have in fact enhanced the value of our paper, while the value of gold remains the same. It is a misnomer to say that gold rises and falls. And the theory that you can make money out of chips and whet-stones and paper and the like is all a delusion and a snare. There is no money except gold and silver. And when we say that we will pay our bonds we mean that we will pay them in gold and silver. We are paying at the rate of $125,000,000 a year in gold in the way of interest on our debt, and we are abundantly able to do so. The product of bullion from the Pacific States alone will reach this year $100,000,000, and it will remain at that figure for twenty years to come.

I have not time now to explain the data upon which I base this assertion, but I challenge the attention of thinking men throughout the country to the fact that we are developing there gold and silver mines that will bring up the product of bullion to $100,000,000 a year, and this added to $20,000,000 received from abroad will afford ample means for meeting the national obligations in the only currency in which they can rightfully be discharged. But for the untimely expressions of politicians designed for political purposes, our bonds would not now be depressed in the markets of the world; we could go abroad and borrow money, enabling us to issue new bonds at a lower rate of interest. If this bill be passed, as I hope it will be by an overwhelming, or still better, a unanimous vote, our bonds will at once exhibit a decided advance in the markets of the world. But, sir, the policy of paying our bonds in greenbacks and then allowing those greenbacks to depreciate as they must to almost nothing, the policy of redeeming our interest-bearing bonds with mere due-bills which bear no interest and are never to be paid, is repudiation such as must stamp with disgrace any man or any nation that may be guilty of it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted to me it would be impossible to discuss the legal question involved in this measure, and I will not undertake to do so. I shall merely seek to direct the attention of the House to the position toward which the current of events is naturally tending, and to which we must, all of us, within a short time find ourselves inevitably drawn. If we intend that this Government shall ever resume specie payments it is proper that we should at this time indicate that intention to the world by some bill or resolution which shall express our determination in emphatic and unmistakable language.

The question as to the currency in which our bonds shall be paid, which has been so much discussed in this Hall and throughout the country during the last two or three years, can be as well settled now as at any other time. I presume that no wise man in the country believes at the present day that the policy of the Government will be to discharge its indebtedness by the issue of new obligations. Although my own mind once tended in the direction of such a policy, yet the discussion which the question has received, both here and before the people, has brought me to the conviction which I advocated before my constituents last fall, that the payment of a debt by the creation of a new debt is no payment at all. Although this proposition had for a time been considered doubtful by a portion of the people of my State, yet they then decided that the bonds of the Government are payable in money—not in paper currency, not in greenbacks, not in bank notes, but in that which is considered money by all civilized nations. The decision of the people of my State on this question was given in such a manner as should satisfy their representatives that the decision must be sustained.

I have stated the position I took before my constituents, not that the law necessarily requires by its terms the redemption of our bonds in coin, but that it is our duty to make such redemption and to declare specifically that such is our intention. Sir, it appears to me it is nonsense for us to discuss this question any longer. It is nonsense for us to talk of paying $2,000,000,000 of bonds with $2,000,000,000 of greenbacks. And, sir, at this time when we are about to enter upon a new Administration it is highly befitting that we should proclaim to the world that we intend to pay our obligations in the currency of the world; that we do not intend that hereafter the bonds of our Government shall be worth in London but eighty cents on the dollar, while the bonds of the State of Massachusetts are worth 105. There is no reason for this depreciation of our bonds in the markets of the world except that the discussions we have had on the question have raised a doubt as to the currency in which we intend to discharge our national obligations. Heretofore our bonds have constantly fluctuated, rising upon the introduction here of every resolution looking to their payment in gold, and falling upon the introduction of every resolution proposing payment in greenbacks.

Now, let us stop this higgling about it, and say as an honest people that we mean to pay our honest debts, both greenbacks and bonds, in such money that the world recognizes as money. If you pass the first section of this bill—I speak of the first section; I have nothing to say of the second section, for I leave the discussion of that to other gentlemen—if you pass the first section of this bill in less than thirty days the bonds known as five-twenties will be higher in the market than ever before since their issue.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield for one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say nothing myself, but I have sent up to the Clerk's desk to have read a letter from one of the best financiers in the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, February 18, 1869.

SIR: There is another point that I wish to bring to your notice. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report says that while the large customs receipts are satisfactory in a revenue point of view, they show that we are running in debt to foreign nations very fast. It is not probable that the present tariff will produce more than $90,000,000 a year when we cease to run in debt. In other words, nearly one half of our customs receipts came from goods for which we run in debt to foreign nations. When our bonds are all exhausted, and we cease to import more than we pay for, it will be necessary to increase the duties on tea, coffee, and sugar, and other articles of necessary consumption, in order to pay the interest. We shall have to do this or reduce the interest. The talk about funding at a lower rate of interest is all nonsense; such a measure cannot be accomplished except by compulsion. These foreign bondholders buy our 1862 five-twenties at a great shave, receiving six per cent. in gold on the par value, and expect to receive the equivalent of gold for them in thirteen years hence, (1875.) It is no wonder that our bonds go abroad. They buy at 85, for instance, receiving interest at the rate of seven and a half per cent. in gold on 85, and in thirteen years they get 100 in gold. That is the expectation which Mr. SCHENCK's bill gives them.

Now, I hope you will not be satisfied to tax the coupons ten per cent. I hope you will reduce the interest to four per cent. and let the interest be taxed in the shape of income, this reduction of the rate of interest to be in lieu of taxation of the face of the bonds. I think we cannot rightfully tax any but our own citizens.

The amount of bonds that have been shipped recently is perfectly enormous, and in my judgment the man is a fool who supposes the country can suffer any such exhaustion. "Is it altogether safe," asks Burke, "to allow the patience of the people to be the only limit to taxation?" Mr. SCHENCK's bill should be entitled: A bill to increase the burden of taxation, encourage the export of bonds, and insure repudiation. The real repudiators in this country are those who are crushing the people to the earth with unequal taxation and goading them to desperation.

I am, yours, respectfully,

Hon. B. F. BUTLER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield for ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, considering the time allowed to me I must direct my attention strictly to the provisions of the pending bill. The first section pledges the faith of the United States to pay in coin or its equivalent all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money, or other currency than gold and silver. How many members of this body are there who do not believe that all the obligations of the nation calling for dollars, and not expressly payable in currency or lawful money, will be paid in coin or its equivalent? I will risk my judgment for accuracy by saying that there are not thirty.

We are part of a great family of nations; we are an important integer in this family. We recognize and are bound by the laws, regulations, and customs of this great family, and one of these laws, regulations, and customs is that the precious metals alone constitute the standard of values; and the history of centuries, nay of hundreds of centuries, has established, continued, and sanctioned this custom. We cannot ignore or violate this law without dishonor. We may have for our own use as a temporary necessity a paper dollar, but this is in its utility local, and unknown and unrecognized among other nations, and even here with us the value of this paper dollar depends largely upon its convertibility into coin. He who endeavors to give value to paper money otherwise than by its convertibility into coin does not understand what he is talking about. I regard, therefore, all efforts to create paper into money as futile, chimerical, and mischievous, come from whatever source they may; and all efforts made here or elsewhere to pay our debts in paper promises which we have agreed to pay in dollars seem to me as tending to dishonor and disgrace.

But I may be asked, Mr. Speaker, why make this declaration or pledge now and at this time? I answer, because the conduct of certain political organizations and of individuals has rendered it necessary. A great effort has been made by the party which during the war opposed the loyal people to break down and destroy the debt which was necessarily contracted in saving the nation's life. And the late rebel and rebel-sympathizing party are endeavoring to rebuild their disrupted organization by this attack on the nation's credit, supposing that the cupidity and avarice of the people will be a guarantee for success. I trust they will be mistaken. This effort in all parts of Europe, but in some places more than others, has impaired confidence in our national credit and honor, but not in our financial ability; and this impaired confidence has and still does depress our securities abroad, and it is to restore this confidence and credit we are at work to-day. We ought, as far as possible, to remove this stain. We must show the world that we are as just and honest as we are strong and powerful. This being done we shall hereafter, and as soon as we are able to pay coin on our circulating notes, be able to borrow money here and elsewhere at rates of interest as low as any nation upon the earth, I think much lower. Then, as our bonds become payable at the option of the Government, we shall be able anywhere and everywhere to negotiate new loans at a reduced rate of interest, and thus mitigate our national burdens and preserve our integrity and good name unsullied and without reproach.

If the attacks upon the nation's faith to which I have alluded had not been made this pledge of faith would not have been needed. If the rebellion had not been commenced the war to crush it would have been avoided. As we met and vanquished the assaults upon the Government so must we meet and vanquish the assaults upon our credit and our honor. I should be glad to move an amendment to the second section, which, I think, would remove objections to that section; but as I cannot offer it I will read it here. I move to add to the second section, so it will read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or a sale of property, or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which is carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale, or of the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given; and if it shall be shown that the consideration was not entirely a loan of coin, or that the property, labor, or service, the price of which was carried into the contract was not adjusted on the basis of its real and actual coin value at the date of the contract, then such agreement to pay in coin shall be void, and the obligation shall be enforced as if this act had not been passed.

This section of the bill legalizes contracts payable in coin where coin was the only consideration, and where property, labor, or service being the consideration were placed at an actual coin value at the date of the contract. This provision seems to me necessary for several reasons.

First, it is a step toward resumption, and serves to grade the road to resumption, thus reaching this desirable end by easy steps that will not shock nor violently disturb the business or material interests of the country.

Again, in our large commercial centers coin must be used; it is necessary to pay duties, and for other reasons. The borrower of coin now has to pay something for the hazard which the lender runs when the loan is made, and business is embarrassed and rates of interest increased. Legalize such contracts and you will facilitate the business of the country; you will diminish the rate of interest when coin is loaned; you will let loose coin, and, to some extent, introduce it into the channels of business; and all this looks toward and prepares for the great desideratum of the nation, a resumption which shall not be attended with a too cruel and disastrous shrinking or reduction of value.

I give this bill in all its parts my hearty and cordial support, because I think it is what the nation sooner or later must do, and I sincerely think the sooner we do what is here proposed the better.

I cannot omit to express my sincere thanks to the Committee of Ways and Means for introducing this measure; and I feel assured that whether it be adopted now or not it is destined in the end to become the nation's policy. The ability with which the measure has been sustained by the chairman of the committee strengthens the credit of this nation, let the present fate of this measure be as it may.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will now give three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt about the proposition that the fifty-two bonds are, by the law which authorized their issue, payable either directly or indirectly in gold coin, for if payable in notes the notes are national obligations as sacred as the bonds, and are due on demand in coin; and hence I shall vote for the first section of this bill upon the ground that it is a mere expression of opinion on the legal question involved. I, however, regret its introduction here for reasons which I will state. If it is a mere legislative opinion upon an existing contract, in giving that opinion we are going outside of our duty. That business is for the courts. On the other hand, if my opinion about the law as it stands should be erroneous, and if it requires legislation to make these bonds payable in gold, then I affirm we have no right to legislate. The contract as it now stands is written in the law under which it was made. It was entered into by the parties with the law before them. The tax-payers and the bondholders are the parties to it. What right have we upon the application of one of these parties, and without the consent of the other, to change the terms of that contract. Hence it is that while I shall vote for the measure as an expression of opinion upon the existing law, I regret its introduction at this time. If there is any doubt in the law the tax-payers have a right to insist that that doubt shall be suffered to remain for the purpose of enabling us to borrow again under a law clear of that doubt, and at a lower rate of interest, to discharge those bonds alleged to be questionable, and we have no right to deprive them of that.

With respect to the second section I am under some difficulty. If I could be satisfied that it was so guarded that the creditor could not use it as an engine of oppression toward the debtor I would vote for it with pleasure, provided some means were attached to it by which the legal-tender notes would not become further depreciated as they are thrown out of use by the introduction of coin in the business of the country. Without this the step we are asked to take is one from rather than toward specie payments. But I shall probably vote for this section also with the hope that some means will be provided to prevent further depreciation of the notes as a consequence of the introduction of coin, and with the hope that Congress in the future will protect the debtor class against the creditor class if the law should prove to be an engine of oppression.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is before the House, and as we all have a vote to give upon it, and as I intend to vote "ay," I wish to say a word or two by way of giving my reasons therefor. I look upon it as a step toward the resumption of specie payments in cooperation with the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and as I consider the return to specie payments one of the greatest blessings I feel it my duty, directly or indirectly, in whatever manner I can, to bring about that result.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in making gold contracts legal has led the way to the resumption of specie payments, which will be availed of first by the importers of the country, next by traders generally, and in the end, through the action of all classes, will sooner or later, either with or without the cooperation of Congress, in my judgment, enforce the resumption of specie payments.

The next step is a general belief or impression that the credit of the country and the character of the country are able to maintain specie payments; and this exposition of the law, or what is intended to be the law, is calculated, so far as Congress can go, to give that pledge to the country and the world that we intend to meet all our obligations of whatever kind and character sooner or later in coin. There is nothing, as I understand it, in this declaration here which goes further than the declaration of both parties prior to the presidential campaign.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I wish to say that that is not Democratic doctrine.

Mr. BROOKS. This bill declares that "the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged for the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the use of such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver." As I understand this we pledge ourselves to the maintenance of the law, and only to the maintenance of the law.

In reply to the remark of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. VAN TRUMP,] as I shall not have time to continue the argument I designed to make, I have to say that the precedents of the Democratic party, the whole history of that party, its beautiful and glorious history, made by its trials and temptations, has been for hard money. Hard money is written upon its creed over and over again; and for the sixty years that the Democratic party was in power all the party were more or less faithful to their obligations.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Does the gentleman say that the Democratic creed is embodied in the first section of this bill?

Mr. BROOKS. I understand nothing here to be in conflict with the Democratic creed as enunciated in its council in New York.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I understand a great deal of it to be in conflict with the Democratic creed.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman will have time to reply to me. What I have to say is that in voting for the first section of this bill I pledge myself to abide by the law of the country, and only by the law of the country, nothing more and nothing less. So far as the country has pledged itself to pay in coin it is bound by the most solemn obligation to discharge its debt in coin; and where its debt is to be paid in paper the pledge is to execute the law, and only the law.

Mr. ARNELL. If this bill was in a condition to be amended I would move to strike out the entire exception in the first section, to wit:

Except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

I would do this, Mr. Speaker, in order to leave no shadow of doubt as to the manner in which the public debt of the United States should be paid. I hold that this debt is a sacred obligation, made to preserve the nation's life, and no shade of doubt, in my opinion, should rest upon the character of its payment. The nation has been saved. Her integrity should be as spotless as her victory has been great and overwhelming.

Leave was granted to Messrs. BURR, COBURN, LOUGHRIDGE, PHELPS, BEATTY, VAN TRUMP, HOLMAN, BOYDEN, and MILLER to print remarks on the bill.

[The speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has five minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to know whether he will permit any gentleman opposed to this first section of the bill to speak against it, or whether he confines his liberality to the friends of the measure?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have already permitted two gentlemen to do what they could, and I would gladly have permitted more; for the more the subject is discussed the better assured I am that the world and the people of the United States will confirm favorable action upon an honest bill like this. But, sir, this House would not permit discussion. I labored, as the House will remember, to get a full discussion to allow fifteen-minutes speeches to members upon both sides of the Hall, and my successive propositions were voted down and I was reduced then to the advantage of the hour allowed by the rules of the House to myself, and I have given it all away. If I had given no part of it to any gentlemen on the other side of the question no complaint could be made, for it was all mine to speak in favor of the bill, and it was a mere gratuity upon my part that I have liberally given two gentlemen an opportunity of opposing the bill.

Mr. WOOD. No Democrat has had an opportunity to speak against this proposition. The gentleman has given liberally to those Democrats who are in favor of it, but none to those who are against it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I proposed if I had time—but carried away by my usual amiability I have given it nearly all away—to say a word or two in reference to the second section of the bill. I ask gentlemen to look particularly at that section. I cannot doubt that the first section will be sustained, and I trust the second will be also.

The objection made to a provision legalizing gold contracts has always been, as is well understood, the apprehension that it may afford to a hard creditor, upon the renewal of an old contract, opportunity to embarrass or grind his debtor. That objection, I think, is fully provided against by the care with which this section has been drawn. I ask gentlemen to look at it. They will find, in the first place, that these contracts must be specifically made payable in coin, and that they can only be made so when the consideration is a loan of coin itself, or when it is for some labor or service performed or property purchased, which labor or service or property has been reduced to its coin value as that value stood at the time the consideration was agreed upon. And to avoid all questions about remedies in courts it is then further provided that in every case where it is set up in support of a contract of this kind, that it has been made in pursuance of these provisions of the law, there shall be permitted an inquiry into the actual consideration so as to ascertain whether it be so or not. The Supreme Court has to a certain extent, perhaps, obviated the necessity, by its late decision, of passing a section of this kind; but the dictum of the Chief Justice and the actual case before the court are not precisely coextensive, and some doubts may exist upon the subject, and we are but legislating in the direction which the court has taken by its judgment in affirming by positive enactment of law this provision which is proposed here in the section under consideration.

I hold, therefore, that instead of its being an argument against this second section that the Supreme Court have rendered such a decision, it is an additional reason for passing it; it is a reason consisting in the fact that we are giving clearness and precision to the law so as to relate to past contracts and future contracts, contracts made since the passage of the legal-tender act as well as contracts made before, so as to brush away all question, all doubt, all possibility of the people being misled by not knowing precisely to what extent the court yet intend to go.

The previous question having been sustained, gentlemen will have an opportunity to vote against the sections of this bill separately.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent of the House to speak for five minutes on the first section of this bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

Mr. SHANKS. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 133, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Bowen, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Coker, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Deweese, Donnelly, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Fox, French, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Benton, Boies, Buckland, Callis, Cary, James T. Elliott, Garfield, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Nicholson, Nunn, Pettis, Polsley, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Sitgreaves, Sypher, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—85.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SCHENCK said: My colleague, Mr. GARFIELD, has requested me to state that he is detained in his room by illness, and that if here he would vote for this bill.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. NIBLACK, to strike out the first section, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver: Provided, however, That before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature, or be paid before maturity the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if he will consent to so modify the first section as to specify which of these issues of bonds are payable in paper?

Mr. SCHENCK. The main question has been ordered, and the subject has passed beyond my control.

Mr. NIBLACK. As I have had no opportunity to debate this bill, I call for the yeas and nays on my motion to strike out the first section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 130, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Bowen, Burr, Roderick B. Butler, Cobb, Coburn, Deweese, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Loan, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Orth, Pike, Pruyn, Ross, Shanks, Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Tift, Van Auker, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Young—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Coker, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Thomas D. Elliott, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gossbrenner, Gove, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Heaton, Hight, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Kintz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Malory, Marvin, Maynard, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stover, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—130.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Boies, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Cary, Cook, Dawes, Edwards, French, Garfield, Hamilton, Haughey, Asahel W. Hubbard, Lincoln, Loughridge, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrill, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Polsley, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Sitgreaves, Sypher, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodward, and Woodward—38.

So the motion to strike out the first section of the bill was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. ALLISON, to amend by striking out the second section, reading as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or a sale of property, or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which as carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale, or of the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 100, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Bowen, Bromwell, Benjamin F. Butler, Coker, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Deweese, Dickey, Donnelly, Eckley, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fox, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Hawkins, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kelsey, Knott, Kintz, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Lynch, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, Upson, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Young—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blair, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick B. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Malory, Marvin, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Newsham, Norris, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stone, Stover, Taber, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, and Wood—100.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Bingham, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Dockery, Eggleston, French, Garfield, Hamilton, Haughey, Higby, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kellogg, Lincoln, Logan, Marshall, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Pettis, Pile, Polsley, Prince, Randall, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Sitgreaves, Sypher, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodward, and Woodward—50.

So the motion to strike out the second section was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 60, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Thomas D. Elliott, James T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Bowen, Bromwell, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Coker, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Deweese, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, worth, Fox, French, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hopkins, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Nunn, Orth, Pike, Ross, Shanks, Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Young—60.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Bailey, Barnes, Bingham, Boles, Boutwell, Buckland, Cary, Dickey, Dockery, Edwards, Garfield, Gravely, Hamilton, Haughey, Asahel W. Hubbard, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Nicholson, Pierce, Pile, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Selye, Sitzgreaves, Sypher, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—42.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1864) for the repeal of tonnage duties on Spanish vessels.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. COBURN. I move that the House reciprocate the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 440, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

Mr. COBURN. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose I have indicated.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 48.

Mr. COBURN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 69, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Blair, Boyden, Buckley, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cullom, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferry, French, Glossbrenner, Goss, Grover, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, William Lawrence, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Mullins, Mungen, Nowcomb, Newsham, Niblack, Norris, Paine, Raum, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Stevens, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Tift, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Young—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Bonton, Brooks, Broomall, Chandler, Churchill, Cornell, Covode, Dickey, Dixon, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Halsey, Hill, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Jenekes, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, Mercut, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Porham, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Scofield, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Wood—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Barnes, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Cake, Cary, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Edwards, Ela, Eldridge, Garfield, Golladay, Gore, Gravely, Haight, Hamilton, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Johnson, Kellogg, Lafin, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Phelps, Pierce, Pile, Polsley, Price, Prince, Randall, Selye, Sitzgreaves, Stone, Sypher, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—61.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by its Secretary, Mr. GORHAM, which announced that that body, having proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the bill entitled "An act regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores," returned to the House of Representatives by the President of the United States with his objections, and sent by the House to the Senate, with the message of the President returning the bill, had resolved that the bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles without amendment:

An act (H. R. No. 2003) to authorize the county commissioners of Ada county, Idaho, to select a site for a territorial prison; and

An act (H. R. No. 2004) establishing the tenure of office of the house of representatives and providing for biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1599, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, and had appointed Mr. GRIMES, Mr. HENDRICKS, and Mr. NYE as such committee on its part.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1812, to allow deputy collectors or assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors or assessors, and had appointed Mr. CATTELL, Mr. MORRILL of Vermont, and Mr. WARNER as such committee on its part.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 375) to repeal an act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes, and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue and for the prevention of smuggling; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1804) to establish a bridge across the East river between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, as a post road.

It announced in conclusion that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 735) to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and to protect the inhabitants thereof;

A joint resolution (S. No. 214) changing the name of the steamship Aries, of the Philadelphia and Boston steamship line, to that of Spartan;

A bill (S. No. 761) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Delaware river, between Philadelphia and Camden;

A bill (S. No. 895) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Willamette river, in Oregon, from the city of Portland to the east bank of said river;

A bill (S. No. 789) making an appropriation and authorizing the purchase of additional ground for the Nashville custom-house;

A bill (S. No. 926) to provide for the enrollment and license of certain foreign vessels;

A bill (S. No. 731) to authorize the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company to land its submarine cable upon the shores of the United States; and

A bill (S. No. 755) to define the limits of the collection district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence from the session of to-night was granted to Mr. PAINE.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. LAFLIN, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers presented by Jeremiah Smith to the Thirty-Fifth Congress, praying for compensation for the loss of a steamer in the service of the Government, copies to be left.

RESOLUTIONS OF INDIANA LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, asking Congress to inquire into the losses sustained by the officers and men of battery F, United States artillery, wrecked at sea; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that after to-day the House shall meet at eleven o'clock instead of twelve o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. Would it not be as well to say ten o'clock?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think we could get a quorum here at that hour.

Mr. PRUYN. Let us sit from eleven till six o'clock, and have no night sessions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to interfere with the recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from New York that unless we have night sessions or some other order the Committee on Appropriations will have no time that they can command for the appropriation bills. They have the night sessions now absolutely, but during the day privileged reports are in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope there will be no objection to meeting at eleven o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we shall meet at half past ten o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he say after to-morrow.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think we had better begin to-morrow.

Mr. BROOKS. I have to be on two committees at half past ten o'clock.

Mr. SPALDING. I shall object unless the order is for after to-morrow.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I ask unanimous consent that after to-morrow the House shall meet daily at eleven o'clock.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill, and moved that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order after to-morrow until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. These are Senate amendments on which points of order cannot be reserved. If any amendments are recommended by the Committee on Appropriations the right to raise points of order on those amendments will be reserved.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The following clause of the bill, as amended by the Committee of the Whole, was under consideration:

In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and the several bureaus, including copying, labor, binding, sealing ships' registers, translating foreign languages, advertising, and extra clerk hire for preparing and collecting information to be laid before Congress, and for miscellaneous items, $50,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid as salary or compensation to the Special Commissioner of the Revenue.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to add to the proviso which has been adopted the words "after June 1, 1870." I offer that amendment for the purpose of securing the services of this Special Commissioner of the Revenue during most of the next fiscal year. It is well understood by gentlemen of the House that it is necessary to amend both the internal revenue laws now upon the statute-book, and also to make a thorough revision of the tariff laws.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I rise to a question of order. If I understand the amendment aright it provides that no portion of the money shall be paid after the 1st of June, 1870. My question of order is that this appropriation is from the 1st of June, 1869, to the 1st of June, 1870, and the provision which he makes would be after the time of this appropriation entirely, and therefore it is not in order in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is for the House to determine whether it is expedient to do that which would seem to be inconsistent.

Mr. ALLISON. I would remind my friend that the fiscal year ends the 30th of June, and not on the 1st of June. I supposed he was aware of that. It seems he is not. Now, my object is to secure the service of this Special Commissioner for the most part of this year, and I desire now to say a word with reference to the past services of this Commissioner in reply to what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] last evening. I understood him to hold this man responsible for the failure of what was known as the large tariff bill in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I think he does that gentleman entirely too much credit when he attributes the failure of that bill to his efforts. I remember distinctly the failure of that bill, and if it is to be charged to anybody it should lie at the door of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania himself. That bill went from the House of Representatives during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, was reported early in the second session to the Senate, and passed that body, I think, before the middle of January. It came back to this House, and because the gentleman from Pennsylvania insisted that it should go to the Committee of Ways and Means and not be acted upon in the House, it went to that committee and remained there for more than three weeks for the purpose of receiving amendments from gentlemen on that committee, chiefly increasing the duty on iron and steel upon those fixed by the amendments of the Senate. So that if any one is to be charged with the responsibility of the failure of that bill it is the gentlemen who are not satisfied with the increase made by the Senate upon the existing tariff on manufactured iron and steel, but desired that the duty should be greatly increased beyond what the Senate proposed.

Now, sir, I did not wish to allude to the history of that tariff bill, but I assert here that it was not the fault of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue that it did not finally pass, and I appeal to gentlemen here who desire a fair revision of the tariff, whether in the interest of protection, so called, or whether in favor of moderate protection, or in favor of a tariff for revenue, not to strike down on the 1st day of June next an officer and an office which is of vast value to the people of this country. I call upon the gentlemen who intend to vote against this Special Commissioner of the Revenue to remember that we are about to have a change of administration, and is it possible that a majority of this House, having faith in the incoming President, believe that if we now have an officer who is unfit for the discharge of his duties the President will not remove him and put in his place another man capable of discharging the important duties that we have imposed upon him by law? Therefore I trust we will at least continue the appropriation for eleven months of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I think we had a very fair expression of opinion on this subject last night, and I was in hopes the gentleman would have sympathy enough for his friend, not to attempt to drag him before the House again; but as he has trotted him out, I hope the House will stand by what they have done. I did charge, and I reiterate it, that the defeat of the tariff bill was owing to the manipulations of this Special Commissioner. I charged it, as I thought, with full knowledge of the fact. Now, when the gentleman undertakes to make this House believe that I was the cause of the defeat of that bill I do not think it necessary to make any reply to that. I believe I am understood on that subject in this House and in the country, so that it is entirely unnecessary to defend myself against any such charge as that.

Mr. ALLISON. If the gentleman will allow me, I did not mean to say he intentionally defeated it. I only meant that he insisted on amendments which made it fail for want of time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I understood perfectly what the gentleman meant. I said last night, and I say now, that the tariff bill was defeated by offering a substitute in the Senate which this Special Commissioner had prepared and which the Senate Committee on Finance adopted. That put so much into the bill, or rather made an entirely new bill of such length, that there was not time to pass it; so it failed for want of time, as a good many of our bills in the Committee of Ways and Means have done.

I repeat, as the gentleman has brought his friend before the House again, that I do not think we have any use for such an officer, and I hope some gentleman will relieve me from the necessity of offering a bill to abolish the office, which I shall feel bound to do if no one else offers it before this Congress closes.

We have our Secretaries, who are the official agents of the President, and they make their official reports to Congress. Now, we do not want a subordinate officer to give his opinions and his views and to prepare bills for Congress. If this gentleman were suffered to go on for a few years in the way he has been running for some time past, and with such elegant gentlemen to back him as he has had here, I do not know but what he might do the whole business. I do not know but what we might dispense with Congress altogether, and even with the Cabinet officers and the President also. I do not know but this gentleman might be looked to to run the whole machine. If the power was given to him, if we put him in the place of the Secretary of the Treasury, or even of General Grant himself, he might run the whole machine without assistance, and he would look upon Congress as a trammel in his way.

Now, I do not think that this gentleman is so valuable to Congress and to the country as to justify our continuing his salary any longer. That was my opinion last night when I offered my amendment, and I intend to follow it up, if no other gentleman does, with a bill to abolish the office.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "1st of June, 1870" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "30th of May, 1869." I make this motion because I agree in some points with the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] I think that the tariff law and the internal revenue law both need general revision. And I think that Congress should have a fair chance to get at the facts on which to legislate, and not be put in the position of relying upon the reports of a man who in his last report has falsified nearly all the facts he pretended to submit.

I have shown you that he has pointed out as a season of prosperity a period when labor was out of employment and the deposits in savings-banks were running down rapidly. I have shown you that he points out as a season ruinous to the labor of the country a period when labor is fully and profitably employed, and when the laboring people in four States and two cities added in one little year over twenty million dollars to their deposits in the savings-banks. I have shown you his demonstration that the wealth of the country is at least $32,000,000,000, and yet I hold in my hand his subsequent official report announcing to Congress that the wealth of the country is but $20,000,000,000, and asking it to rudely contract the currency to accord with his newly conceived dimensions of the wealth of the country. I have shown you—I did it last night—the suppression on the part of Mr. Wells of the most remarkable development of material resources and motive-power that the world has ever seen: the recent development of the bituminous coal-fields of this country, the substitution of coal for wood over hundreds of thousands of miles of territory, and of the steam-engine for muscular power over the same broad stretch of territory. These important facts are carefully concealed and buried in a parenthetical clause which contains a misstatement as ponderous as was ever made in such a clause, that the whole extent of the development of the bituminous coal-fields and the consequent increase of productive motive-power of this country has been but eight per cent. in three years. That is his statement, while, as I have shown you, the facts are that in Kansas it has been eight thousand per cent.; in Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, it has been in each more than eight hundred per cent.; and taking all the coal-bearing regions of the country into consideration, the increase has not been less than seven hundred per cent.

Now, sir, these perversions and suppression of significant facts cannot in my judgment be the result of mere confusion, but are the result of design. They are perpetrated because we have a Commissioner who has preconceived notions that he is determined to force upon Congress, and when he finds facts which do not sustain them, like the French philosopher he thinks it so much the worse for the facts, and sets them aside as not worthy of consideration. We should not pay a man to mislead and deceive us. If we want facts relative to revenue gathered and collated for us let us divide the money now paid Mr. Wells between Robert J. Walker, the great champion of free trade, and Henry C. Cary, the ablest expounder of the value of protection to the wages of American laborers, and let each give us honestly the facts that sustain his theory, and we will get the information we need. But do not let us pay the salary and traveling expenses and furnish clerks for a man whose sole business seems to be to deceive and delude those who are engaged in making laws for the country. I hope the amendment adopted last night will not be modified.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Chairman, when the provision for the appointment of this Special Commissioner of the Revenue was first adopted it struck me as an incongruity. I thought that the existing offices of Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue provided ample means for gathering and collecting the necessary facts for the action of Congress. But I must say that the manner in which Mr. Wells has discharged his duties has inclined me very strongly to the opinion that it was wise in Congress to establish this office, and very wise in the appointing power to select Mr. Wells to discharge its duties. Mr. Wells has had the misfortune to ascertain, in the course of his investigations, that the duty upon pig-iron is very high. In his various investigations in relation to this subject he has ascertained that the manufacture of pig-iron costs some twenty-three dollars a ton, while it usually sells, I think, for about forty dollars a ton, making a very respectable margin of some seventeen dollars a ton. As the duty on imported pig-iron is nine dollars in gold per ton, and as from time to time this suffering interest has clamored very much on the ground of want of protection, the facts exhibited in Mr. Wells's report are of course offensive to gentlemen engaged in that branch of trade. A profit of seventeen dollars per ton on pig-iron which costs twenty-three dollars per ton is, of course, not sufficient.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PIKE. I have but five minutes, and there is another item to which I wish to refer.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I simply want to ask the gentleman in what market pig-iron sells for the price he has named? I would like to know where such a market is to be found.

Mr. PIKE. I am speaking of the facts developed in the report of the Commissioner, as I recollect them. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] being engaged in the iron trade, is of course more familiar with the precise details in regard to this business. I understand the Commissioner to say that the ordinary selling price of pig-iron is about forty dollars a ton; it may be somewhat less. Mr. Wells having committed the great offense of ascertaining and exhibiting the facts with reference to the manufacture of pig-iron, the gentlemen who expected this Special Commissioner to gather facts to sustain this duty of nine dollars in gold per ton, and not only to sustain but to increase that duty, do not like the result. I do not blame them. Not liking the result, they do not like the Commissioner; I do not blame them. Not liking the Commissioner they want the office abolished. The question now comes before the House whether or not, at the urgent request of these gentlemen, this office shall be abolished. For my part, I have been very much gratified to see that there is some officer of this Government who can present a series of facts upon which the House may intelligently act.

Then, again, the gentlemen connected with the salt trade made a few years ago, as Mr. Wells ascertained, an investment of $160,000, which has since swollen to the respectable sum of three or four millions. In this case the duty is eighteen cents per hundred pounds; and if I recollect aright, the little tariff bill of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] proposed that this suffering interest should be relieved by increasing the duty from eighteen cents to twenty-four cents. This branch of business, it appears, has suffered enormously, because the investment of $160,000 has swollen to only three or four millions. This increase is so moderate that gentlemen are not satisfied with it; so, of course, they do not like the Commissioner, and of course they want the office abolished. And all these other interests that have also been suffering so enormously under the present tariff do not like the Commissioner.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. KELLEY. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on the pending paragraph.

There was no objection.

On the amendment of Mr. ALLISON there were—ayes 33, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MOORHEAD and Mr. ALLISON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent of the committee that I may offer an amendment to the paragraph relating to expenses of the Department of State, that paragraph having been passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, carpets, and miscellaneous items for the Treasury bureaus, $20,000.

Mr. STOVER. I move to strike out of this item "$20,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to this special item and to some figures which I have hastily prepared to show what in the last two years has been appropriated for miscellaneous items. At the second session of the Thirty Ninth Congress we appropriated for miscellaneous expenses the sum of $131,500, and at the second session of the Fortieth Congress $160,000—over a quarter of a million dollars.

Now, what is meant by miscellaneous items here I cannot tell, unless it has some reference to the new cash-room in the Treasury extension, which is being fitted up in a style, we are told, to surpass anything of the kind in the world. We see that it is specified that this is for carpets and furniture as well as for miscellaneous items. Within two years we have expended nearly two million dollars for furniture and carpets. Why, sir, men engaged in the Treasury Department are walking on better carpet than they ever walked on before in their lives—better carpet than that we have about this House. The carpets, too, are being constantly renewed. I see a job under it all. Walk up Pennsylvania avenue any Saturday morning and you will see crowds bidding for carpets that are said to be worn out and have to be replaced by new ones in the Departments. These worn-out carpets are greedily snatched up at $2 80 a yard. It is all for the purpose of giving the friends of those who have control of these matters a contract for carpets, and carpets are taken up and sold long before they are worn out. I say that it is a wrong practice and ought to be stopped.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the general purposes of the Treasury Department building, including the extension:
For compensation of twelve watchmen and eleven laborers of the building, $13,800.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$13,800" and in lieu thereof insert "$16,500." Under the appropriation as it is in the bill these watchmen and laborers are compensated at the rate of $600 a year. If you look under the head of General Land Office and Department of the Interior you will find that the salary is fixed at $720. My amendment makes this appropriation conform to the amendment adopted last evening, and gives these men $720 per annum.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As I explained last evening, this appropriation is according to existing law. Some of these watchmen have their pay fixed by law at one rate and some at another. Last night we adopted an amendment to produce uniformity in the pay of these laborers and messengers. That being done, it of course covers all the Departments and puts them upon an equality in that respect. In order to save time I propose that the vote in the House on the gentleman's amendment shall determine the salary of these watchmen and messengers in all the instances in this bill.

Mr. PETERS. I agree to that, and withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TWICHELL. I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 21 and offer an amendment.

Mr. MULLINS. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of the Interior:
For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, Assistant Secretary, chief clerk, four clerks of class four, additional to three disbursing clerks, three clerks of class three, four clerks of class two, one return clerk, one messenger, two assistant messengers, five watchmen, and three laborers in his office, in all, $41,540.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to move to amend by inserting the following after the foregoing paragraph:

Office of Education:
For Commissioner of Education, $3,000; for two clerks of class one, $2,400; for contingent expenses, $600.

I propose, if this is adopted, to offer a proviso on behalf of the committee, disposing of this office after the 30th of June, 1870.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I move to amend the amendment by substituting the following therefor:

Department of Education:
For compensation of Commissioner of Education, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; one clerk of class four, $1,800; and one clerk of class three, $1,600; for stationery, blank books, freight, express charges, library, miscellaneous items, and extra clerical help, $10,000; in all, $20,000.

And so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869," approved July 20, 1868, as provides, "That from and after the 30th day of June, 1869, the Department of Education shall cease," &c., is hereby repealed; and the act entitled "An act to establish a Department of Education," approved March 2, 1867, is hereby declared to remain in full force.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I then withdraw the latter part, which repeals an existing law, and offer the rest.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, as modified, is in order.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The amendment offered by me under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations is just in accordance with the estimate of the Department itself, sent to us through the Secretary of the Interior. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina is enlarging very much upon what the Department has itself asked.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. Mr. Chairman, the law which creates the office of Commissioner of Education also provides what shall be done by the Commissioner of Education and his clerks, and the Commissioner has assured the committee who made an investigation into the matters pertaining to the Department that there is great necessity for these clerks. The gentleman on my right [Mr. FARNSWORTH] says there is no need of them. The Commissioner has assured me otherwise, and the committee on investigation are satisfied that there is great need of these clerks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina, or of any other gentleman, of what use these clerks will be? Indeed, I would like to extend the scope of the inquiry, and ask what earthly use to the Government is this Department of Education? Every State has its commissioner of schools or of education, and we all know that all these Departments created in Washington cost the Government three, four, and even ten times as much as they do anywhere else. And why not, if you have a department of education, have a department of religion, or a department or blacksmithing, or of shoemaking? Why multiply these departments? The Department of Agriculture is about as far as it seems to me we ought to go in this experimental business of creating departments. We have found that to be an expensive concern. The only good thing we get from it, I believe, is an occasional report which the people like—nothing else that amounts to anything—and it costs the Government four or five times as much as it would an individual or even a State to do the same thing. My recollection is that last year we voted down this appropriation, and I hope the committee will do so now, for I do not believe the country will realize any considerable benefit from this Department—nothing, at all events, compared with the cost of it.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. The gentleman from Illinois asks what necessity there is for a Department of Education, and he thinks this is a useless expenditure on the part of the Government. By referring to the report which the committee have already made it will be seen that the memorial to Congress in regard to this Department sets forth the necessity which the memorialists believed to exist for the creation of such a department. They have also referred in their report to the history of the country to show that it is no new thing for those who are high in authority in this country from the time of Washington—

The question was put on Mr. WHITTEMORE's amendment to the amendment; and it was disagreed to—ayes nine, noes not counted.

The question recurred on Mr. SCOTFIELD's amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all except the first item, which provides for the salary of the Commissioner. I am satisfied that there are no clerks needed.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order. I would inquire whether this is not new legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing which relates to the salary of an office already established by law is new legislation under the rulings of the Chair.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I see by the law which we passed last year that we have established the office of Commissioner of Education, but there is no law authorizing the employment of any clerks in connection with it. If there is a sinecure office under this Government it is the office of the Commissioner of Education. No earthly benefit can result from it. The people know nothing about it, and members of Congress know nothing about it. At the time the subject was before the House last year, I recollect the question being asked of some member who was defending this Department of Education where the concern was located, and I believe there was not a gentleman upon this floor who could tell where the office was located, or what it had been doing, or what had been the result of its labors; and the same is true now. I trust this amendment will prevail.

Mr. JENCKES. The remarks of the gentleman from Missouri are convincing of the propriety of this appropriation. He says that we are ignorant of the existence of this Department—that even members of Congress are ignorant of it. I know they are, and it is not to their honor that they are, for if there is any one small office doing good under this Government it is the office of this Commissioner of Education. I remember once meeting in a book-store in this city a gentleman from one of the southern States who was inquiring where he could find some works giving an account of the common-school system of the eastern States. He did not know that there was such an office in the city, and I referred him to the office of the Commissioner of Education. I afterward had the curiosity to inquire who he was and what information he obtained, and I found that he was himself a commissioner from one of the southern States endeavoring to seek knowledge by which he might better administer the duties of his office.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I see that last year we appropriated $10,000 for this concern. Now, my question is: what has been the result of that appropriation? What has issued from that Department?

Mr. JENCKES. The most valuable document that has been printed by this Congress, the report of the Commissioner of Education; and if the gentleman has not seen it I commend to him an examination of it. I know this gentleman who is the Commissioner of Education, and his history in connection with the cause of education. He is a man who has spent his life in this business, and there is no man living either in this country or any other who can better serve the cause of education than he can. If this Government should appropriate fifty or a hundred thousand dollars a year it would be cheap for what he would do in collecting and disseminating useful information in regard to the systems of education in this country and abroad. By this appropriation we do not propose to educate the people, but we undertake to create an exchange where ideas can be passed back and forth through this national office, and where the commissioners of the different States can obtain information concerning European systems of education and anything that would aid in the progress of education.

We have at the head of this Department the most experienced man for that purpose that can be found. To strike out the clerks will be to strike down the office itself, for the business of the Commissioner is correspondence, receiving and answering letters from all parts of the country. It is in this way that this information is disseminated; and if we take away the means for disseminating this information by refusing any appropriation for clerks of what avail is this information? Therefore, instead of reducing this appropriation we should increase it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I renew it. If this was an appropriation to purchase school-books, spelling-books, and primers, to be distributed among the poor of the country, I would vote for it. If it was an appropriation to purchase books needed among the freedmen of the South I would vote for it, for it might then be of some use to the people of the United States. But the book which this Commissioner issues, and of which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] has spoken, is a book for the learned, and of which now and then a man gets a copy. The poor man does not get it; the ignorant man does not get it; but now and then a worthy constituent of my friend from Rhode Island or myself gets this book, and it is a gratification to him to receive it, and particularly is he well gratified to receive it under the frank of my friend or of myself, or of any other member of Congress. To that extent and no further is the appropriation of any earthly use.

As regards the statistics which gentlemen claim are of such value, the high schools and institutions of learning which the States have organized for themselves are the places where valuable information is collected. But a gentleman stuck up here in the third or fourth story of some building in Washington, surrounded by a dozen clerks writing essays or compiling learned statistics to be sent to the constituents of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. WHITTEMORE,] who never were inside a school-house, and who will not be able to read them for a year or two, and who will not be able to understand them for five years—of what earthly use is such information as that? This is not one of the proper functions of our Government, or if it is we should go further and establish departments of various kinds of science, a department of engineering, &c. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] did propose some time since to establish a department of mines and mining. We might better establish such a department as that than to vote supplies to support this one.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Committee on Education examined this subject and reported to the Committee on Appropriations, I believe unanimously, that they were in favor of as large an appropriation as this. I think that perhaps they went a little further. The Committee on Appropriations then investigated the subject carefully. They had Professor Barnard before them, and they listened to all the scandal which the President of the United States has condescended to throw around this man. The committee came to the conclusion that Professor Barnard stood in the same relation that do all the good men of this country who are assailed by the President of the United States. It is only the bad men of the country who have escaped the assaults of the highest office-holder in the land.

After a careful consideration of the matter the Committee on Appropriations thought it was little enough to recommend for the great educational interests of this country an appropriation of $6,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] said last night that his fellow-members ought to be ashamed of themselves not to give $1,200 each to the female clerks employed by the Government. Now, it seems to me that when only $6,000 are asked for the great educational interests of this country, to pay a single professor and two first-class clerks, the lowest order of clerks, and only $600 for contingent expenses, gentlemen should be ashamed to get up here and oppose it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to correct the gentleman. I said last night that I was ashamed that gentlemen were not willing to vote as much pay to a woman for doing the same work as they would vote to a man. That is what I said.

Mr. SCOFIELD. For the consolation of those gentlemen who are opposing this small appropriation I will say that I am instructed by the committee to propose, should my present amendment be adopted, a proviso which will limit the continuance of this office to the next fiscal year, leaving Congress free to make appropriations for this purpose or not, as may be deemed best. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on the pending paragraph.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

On agreeing to the amendment of Mr. SCOFIELD, there were—ayes 60, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCOFIELD and Mr. FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 42.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend by adding the following to the paragraph just adopted:

Provided, That the office of Commissioner of Education shall cease at the expiration of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

Mr. ARCHER. I raise the point of order that this amendment proposes new legislation, and is therefore not in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For cash system, maps, diagrams, stationery, furniture, and repairs of the same, miscellaneous items, including two of the city newspapers, to be filed, bound, and preserved for the use of the office; for advertising and telegraphing, for miscellaneous items on account of bounty lands and military patents under the several acts, and for contingent expenses under swamp-land act of September 28, 1850, $8,000.

Mr. DICKEY. I move to amend by striking out at the beginning of the paragraph just read the words "cash system." I would like to know what those words mean.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveyor general of Colorado and Utah, $3,000, and for the clerks in his office, $4,000, $7,000.

Mr. CAKE. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the words "and Utah." I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the salary of the surveyor general of Utah is provided for in another part of the bill.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveyor general of Utah Territory, $3,000; and the clerks in his office, $4,000.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States Patent Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, $4,500; for chief clerk, $2,500; for three examiners in chief, at $3,000 each, $9,000; twenty principal examiners, at $2,500 each, $50,000; twenty first assistant examiners, at $1,800 each, $36,000; twenty second assistant examiners, at $1,600 each, $32,000; one disbursing clerk, $2,000; one librarian, $1,800; one machinist, $1,600; one messenger, $1,000; making in all the sum of $140,400.

Mr. KELSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the clause appropriating the salary of the chief clerk the following:

One superintendent of drawings for the annual report, $2,500.

I will state that this amendment and some others which I am instructed to offer to other items relating to the Patent Office have been agreed upon on consultation with the Commissioner of Patents. He appeared before the Committee on Appropriations; and it was at his request that these amendments increasing to some extent the appropriations were agreed upon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to amend by adding $2,500 to the gross amount at the end of the paragraph, so as to make it $142,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I move to amend by striking out in lines six hundred and eighty and six hundred and eighty-one the words "$1,800 each, $86,000," and inserting "$2,000 each, $40,000," so as to make the clause read as follows:

Twenty first assistant examiners, at $2,000 each, $40,000.

This amendment proposes only a reenactment of the provision which passed this House in 1867. At the first session of the present Congress I introduced a bill adding twelve to the force of examiners in the Patent Office and adding $200 to the salaries of each of the first assistant examiners, the class between the principal examiners, who get $2,500, and the second assistants, who receive $1,600 each. That bill went to the Senate. The business of the Patent Office was so pressing and the work so many months in arrear that the Senate passed the first section of the bill; but in the economy of its wisdom, I am sorry I cannot say in the wisdom of its economy, it struck out the second section.

The salary of these examiners was fixed in 1848. Since that time I need not say how much the cost of living has increased or how much better clerical ability has been paid than before; and it is too much to expect that we shall get men of the first order of ability, who are to act judicially upon questions involving the nicest legal discrimination and the highest knowledge of mechanical sciences, at $1,800 a year.

The Patent Office, it is well known, is self-sustaining and can well afford to pay adequate compensation to its officers. When the bill I have mentioned passed this House the Patent Office fund was $264,000, which by act of Congress has since been transferred to the Treasury.

In the five months ending January 1, 1869, the surplus of receipts over expenditures was $58,000, and it is estimated that this year it will be over one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The inventors of the country pay this money, and they should have men of the best capacity for this work. The improvident issue of patents alike with their improper rejection may result in much expense and litigation in the former case and great wrong in the latter. As the Government does not lose but the inventors pay all the costs, they are entitled to have the best talent, and it is to their interest it should be well paid.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MYERS. I move to strike out the last word, "dollars."

Mr. Chairman, I do trust the House will give this subject proper consideration, and that it will not be carried away by any false notions of economy. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and who more than these examiners?

Mr. SPALDING. I make the point of order that the gentleman must confine his remarks to his amendment to strike out the word "dollars."

Mr. MYERS. I will do so. This is a question of "dollars." [Laughter.] It is a question whether these Government employes shall receive fair and adequate compensation for the work they do. If the House means to stand by the law it passed in 1867, it will pay the examiners the sum I have named; and but for going beyond that decision, I would at this time move to add to the salaries of each class of examiners, for all deserve it, but these the most. How much has the work increased since 1848 when these salaries were fixed? Sir, as the Commissioner tells us in his report, in one room during the past year more applications have been decided than by the whole office in 1855. I made a statement of the number of applications for patents in 1865 and 1866 when the bill I have alluded to was under discussion. In 1865 there were 10,664, and 6,616 patents were issued. In 1866 there were 15,269, and 9,450 patents were issued. But in 1867 the applications had increased to 21,227, and 13,015 patents were issued; and in 1868 the applications numbered 24,420, and the patents granted 13,378. The skilled men upon whom the brain work of these decisions is devolved ought to have better pay; and as neither the Treasury nor the public will lose by it, I do not see what good ground there is for refusing it to them. I withdraw the amendment, "dollars," in the hope that the committee will yet see the propriety of agreeing to my first amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1673) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1870, had come to no resolution thereon.

WITNESSES IN CONTEMPT DISCHARGED.

Mr. BLAIR, from the special committee to investigate alleged frauds at the late presidential election in the State of New York, submitted the following resolutions; which were severally adopted:

Resolved, That David W. Reeve, arrested by and now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House for refusal to appear before the committee on alleged New York election frauds, be discharged from custody.

Resolved, That John H. Bell, arrested by and now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House for refusal to answer questions put to him by the committee on alleged New York election frauds, be discharged from custody on payment of costs of arrest.

Mr. BLAIR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2003) to authorize the county commissioners of Ada county, Idaho, to select a site for a territorial prison; and

An act (H. R. No. 2004) establishing the term of office of the house of representatives and providing for biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. BUCKLAND for two days on account of illness in his family; to Mr. WOODBRIDGE for four days on account of illness, and to Mr. GARFIELD indefinitely on account of illness.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO.

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be, and they are hereby, authorized to print the testimony taken on the subject of the proper length of span of bridges across the Ohio river.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1673) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The Clerk read as follows:

For thirty-two clerks of class two, $44,800.

Mr. KELSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "thirty-five," so that it will read "for thirty-five clerks of class two."

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "fifty-six" instead of "thirty-five." These appropriations are made necessary from the action of Congress at its last session when it took possession of the Patent Office fund, put it into the Treasury, and made all the expenditures for that office the subject of future appropriation. The Patent Office differs from any other bureau in this Government. It was created for the purpose of carrying out the provision of the Constitution giving protection to science and the useful arts. When the act of 1837, as amendatory of the act of 1836, was passed it was intended and expected that the Patent Office should be self-supporting, and that every person seeking the protection of the Government for his invention or discovery should contribute something to the support of that Department of the Government through which he obtained his aid. That office has been administered upon that principle. It has actually been self-supporting, and had in July last a large amount to its credit in the Treasury. By the act of July last that money was taken possession of as any other money. Previous to that time the Commissioner of Patents employed such clerks as he needed for carrying on this business. Now he reports to the Committee on Patents that he requires the service of these fifty-six clerks to transact the necessary business of the office. They do not take one dollar from the other revenues of the Government. They are all paid their salaries from the proceeds of contributions of inventors, and if the institution is to be carried on at all in the spirit in which it was founded and for the purpose for which it was intended the necessary force should be provided for so carrying it on. Every one knows who has done business at the office for six or seven years past that the force has at all times been insufficient to give prompt decisions upon the cases presented. At different times the business has been from six months to nearly two years in arrear, and if we cut down the present force by the sweeping diminution proposed by the bill—though it is somewhat modified by the amendment—we shall soon bring it to a dead stand; that is, it will be so far in arrear that it will be of little use for an inventor to attempt to obtain a patent in any reasonable or practicable time.

The Commissioner says he absolutely needs this force. He has furnished a list of the number of officers he requires, and without which he says he cannot transact the business. The committee have met him only part way. Unless we give him the requisite means to do the business why should he undertake to do it at all? There is no suggestion by the committee that the business ought not to be transacted, or that there is any reason on the ground of economy or anything else for the diminution of the force. It is a mere arbitrary rule applied to this Department without any useful result whatever.

Mr. KELSEY. Perhaps the committee will better understand this whole question if I send to the Clerk's desk and have read the series of amendments that I shall propose to this part of the bill relating to the force to be employed in the Patent Office. It will be seen that while the Committee on Appropriations have not given the Commissioner of Patents all the force he required, they have materially increased it from what it appears in the bill as it now stands. I send to the Clerk and ask to have read as a part of my remarks the amendments which I am instructed to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line six hundred and ninety, strike out "thirty-two" and insert "thirty-five," and make the total sum $49,600.

Page 29, line six hundred and ninety-two, strike out "twenty-six" and insert "forty," and make the total $48,000.

Page 29, strike out lines six hundred and ninety-four and six hundred and ninety-five.

Page 29, after the word "dollars," on line six hundred and ninety-seven, insert:

For thirteen copyists of drawings at $1,000 each, $13,000; for fifty-three female copyists at $700 each, $37,100.

Page 29, line seven hundred and four, strike out "five," and insert "seven," and make the total $6,300.

Page 29, line seven hundred and six, strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-six," and make the total $21,600.

Page 30, strike out lines seven hundred and eight, seven hundred and nine, and seven hundred and ten, and insert:

For two pages at $432 each, and one washerwoman at $300, $1,164.

Page 30, line seven hundred and sixteen, strike out the words "and so forth, and so forth," and insert, "and other contingencies."

Mr. KELSEY. It will be seen that by those several amendments which I am instructed to offer by the Committee on Appropriations they have provided for nearly the amount of force which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] thinks the Commissioner ought to have. I now ask for a vote on the amendments.

The question was put on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. JENCKES; and there were—ayes 36, noes 59; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELSEY and Mr. JENCKES were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 62.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. KELSEY from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "fifty." It has been suggested that these amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations meet the approbation of the Commissioner of Patents. I am assured by him that they do not, except in part. He has exhibited to the Committee on Appropriations a list of the officers which he deems absolutely necessary for the purpose of transacting the business of the office, and the committee have reduced the number in all instances, and in some instances have reduced the grade, thus not only not furnishing him with a sufficient force to carry on the office as it now is but requiring a reconstitution of the office, either degrading clerks from their present positions to lower ones or appointing new ones to the new positions while the old ones are dismissed. Instead of giving him the means of transacting his business, they throw obstacles in his way that will make it impossible for him to carry it on.

Now, sir, I want the House to understand this question. The Commissioner of Patents is charged with the transaction of this business under the law. The funds which he needs for that purpose are not contributed by the Government or by the people from any other source of taxation. They are the voluntary contributions of the inventors of this country, who come here to seek protection under the law, and in many cases they are the contributions of those who do not obtain that protection; for whether the inventor's application for a patent is granted or rejected the fee required by law is paid and goes into the Treasury for the purpose of paying the expenses of this office. If, therefore, the office is to be carried on as it ought to be the Commissioner should be allowed the necessary force with which to do it. He is the proper person to say what number of clerks of one class he should have and what number of another class, assigning the different duties to each and arranging the whole so that the business of the office may be performed promptly and well. And hitherto, notwithstanding the Commissioner of Patents has had full power to appoint clerks, the business of that office has increased to such an extent that he has not been able to have it promptly transacted. It has increased, and is still increasing. The applications filed in the office during the month of January last were sixteen hundred and ninety-seven; and for one week in February there were four hundred and thirty-four applications. And with this increase in the business of that Department the force which the Commissioner had last July would be incapable to meet the demands of the inventors of this country.

Now, instead of endeavoring to meet the wants of the country, the Committee on Appropriations, under the power which they now have, propose to withhold the necessary appropriations, and for what purpose? Is it for the purpose of raising revenue from these inventors? This is not money which has been paid into the Treasury from taxes raised from the people for any specific object, however necessary for the Government. It is not the money of the people that you are asked to vote away. It is the money of the inventors, earned by toil of brain and sweat of brow, which you steal from them.

Mr. MYERS. Money paid in for this very purpose.

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, money paid in for this purpose. The law made every cent of the money thus paid in a sacred trust in the hands of the Government, to be appropriated for the purpose the law designated. There is no economy in this; it is the reverse of economy; holding out to this class of people, the most meritorious among us, the promise of reward for their inventive talent, while at the same time you take away from them the means by which they can obtain that reward. I have named this addition to the force proposed by the Committee on Appropriations because I am satisfied from my own personal knowledge of the business of that office, as well as from the statement of the Commissioner, that unless he has this number of clerks to take up and carry on this business as it now is in some branches of that Department the business must be stopped.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire only that the Committee of the Whole shall understand this matter. Last year, finding that there was no excess of fees going anywhere; that every dollar the inventors paid in was being squandered; blank-books worth twenty-five cents being bought at twenty-five dollars, and blanks enough purchased at once to supply the office in advance for forty-two years, Congress took the matter in hand and ordered that all the money received for fees should be paid into the Treasury, so that a full and proper account might be kept of it and what was necessary to carry on the work might be appropriated for that purpose.

The Committee on Appropriations undertook to give the Commissioner what we thought he wanted. We found we had made a mistake. He came before us and we heard his statement. We appointed a sub-committee to go and confer with him. That committee came back and reported to us, and we concluded to increase the appropriation to the amount proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELSEY,] even giving the Commissioner $200 for a washerwoman to wash the floors, and just as many copyists as he desires. We only take away from him that most mischievous and most terrible power, the power of appointing temporary and extra clerks without limit. We have given him all he used to have and all that he can make any good use of.

The argument of my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] kills itself. He says that with the unlimited power of appointment that the Commissioner had last July he could not appoint clerks enough to keep up with the business of the office. I know that is so, because he appointed clerks who never went into the office except to draw their salaries.

Mr. JENCKES. That is a slander upon the Commissioner.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is not a slander. The gentleman himself will agree that the man turned out of that office last July, as he knows and as I know, was corrupt from first to last. They have already fourteen hundred employes in that office.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have but a minute or two.

Mr. MYERS. I want simply to know what the last Commissioner has to do with the present one? And when the present Commissioner tells us that he needs this force why will not the Committee on Appropriations give it to him, especially when in one of the rooms the work is three months in arrears? I want the inventors of the country to understand whether their money is spent for their benefit or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no occasion for any heat in regard to this question. All I wish to say is that the inventors will find out, when we have a proper officer as Commissioner of Patents—and I have nothing to say against the gentleman now occupying the position, who is managing the office a great deal better than it has been managed for years past—the work will be attended to properly, and will not be behind. I agree that we did not give the Commissioner of Patents a sufficient number of clerks last year. But in this bill we have nearly doubled the number of clerks; we have allowed him copyists; we have given him every facility that we thought could reasonably be asked, but we do not believe it proper that we should confer on him this power of appointing temporary clerks whenever he may think them necessary. We have in this bill provided for all the force that we think necessary for the office; and if it turns out that more is needed, let the Commissioner of Patents during the next Congress bring in a bill to remodel the office.

My time is expiring; and I will conclude by asking unanimous consent that the debate with reference to clerks in the Patent Office be closed, otherwise we shall consume more time than the question is worth.

Mr. JENCKES. I object.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JENCKES to the amendment of Mr. KELSEY, there were—ayes 20, noes 64; no quorum voting.

The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Committee of the Whole rose informally; the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

— EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose, at the time of taking the recess, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] had offered an amendment to strike out in line six hundred and ninety the words "thirty-two" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty-five;" so as to provide for thirty-five clerks of class two for the Patent Office. To this amendment the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] had offered an amendment to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to provide for fifty clerks of class two. On agreeing to the amendment to the amendment no quorum voted. The question will be again taken.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. JENCKES to the amendment of Mr. KELSEY, there were—ayes 9, noes 12; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this question will be passed over for the present informally.

Mr. PETERS. I object.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JENCKES and Mr. KELSEY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 17, noes 20; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the roll will be called.

The roll was accordingly called; and the following-named members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dewesse, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Edwards, Eggleston, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gove, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kellogg, Kerr, Laffin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Newsam, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Pile, Polesley, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Root, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elishu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole having found itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, and reported to the House the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. Sixty-nine members only have answered to their names.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think if the gentleman who is antagonizing the Committee on Appropriations will agree, these amendments can be considered as adopted and we can have a vote on them in the House. Does he agree to that?

Mr. JENCKES. If my amendments are adopted that is all I can ask. Of course any member can ask for a separate vote on them in the House.

Mr. KELSEY. We cannot agree to that. All we can do now is to adjourn or have a vote of the House. I move that there be a call of the House, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 46, not voting 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Arnell, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckley, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Clift, Cobb, Cook, Corley, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Eli, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Henton, Higby, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Koontz, William Lawrence, Miller, Mills, Mullins, Newsam, Niblack, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pile, Plans, Poland, Price, Prince, Root, Seefeld, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Storer, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, and James F. Wilson—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Boies, Bowen, Boyden, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Covode, Delano, Dewesse, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Edwards, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gove, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Kellogg, Kerr, Laffin, Lash, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrill, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Pettis, Polesley, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Sypher, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elishu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—107.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOYDEN and Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, were granted leave of absence for the evening session.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope that all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the clerks of the Patent Office be closed within five minutes after the consideration of the bill shall be resumed.

Mr. MUNGUN. I hope that will not be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Debate may be closed by a majority vote on the paragraph which has been read, but on the paragraphs which have not been read it will require a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules in order that all debate on the paragraphs in relation to the clerks and other employés in the Patent Office may be closed in five minutes after the consideration of the bill shall be resumed.

Mr. MYERS. I move to make it twenty minutes.

The House divided; and there were ayes—37, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will modify my motion, and make it ten minutes.

The rules were suspended; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on Mr. JENCKES's amendment to Mr. KELSEY's amendment.

The tellers, Mr. KELSEY and Mr. JENCKES, resumed their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 69.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. KELSEY to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "thirty-five;" and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For twenty-six clerks of class one, $31,200.

Mr. KELSEY. I move, on behalf of the committee, to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "forty;" and to increase the amount of appropriation to $48,000.

Mr. SPALDING. That is six more than they ask for.

Mr. AXTELL. I move to amend the amendment by substituting the following:

For forty female clerks, $36,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. AXTELL. For a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to say that if the House shall vote that female clerks shall receive the same pay as male clerks

I will propose then that the bill be amended all through; to make one test question of it to save time.

Mr. AXTELL. I cannot yield any further. We have a test here presented for those who are in favor of economy and of fair play toward the females in employing them as clerks in the Departments. There is no provision in this Department for female clerks, and yet this labor can be performed as well by them as by male clerks, with a saving of the difference between $48,000 and $36,000. You have an opportunity now of throwing open the doors of this class of clerkships for which we now pay $1,200 salary to females in the various Departments. I pledge myself, with the good sense of the House to back me, that you can get competent female clerks for these places. Following out the very able argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] that we ought not to pay more than the market price for labor, you can obtain female clerks at $900 a year, thereby saving $300 on each one of the forty clerks in this Department.

Now, sir, it is not a question of gallantry, I beg gentlemen to believe, when we propose to furnish employment to women. We thereby save these young men that are wasting their lives in this feminine employment with only the prospect of a bare subsistence and no future accumulation; we save them for the great realm of strong labor in the great West, in searching and digging for gold, in hunting the buffalo in Idaho and Montana, in following those pursuits that will develop their manhood. Let them leave these soft places to the women of America who are willing to work cheap. Let us come right down to the proposition and change society in this respect, giving to our sisters and daughters a chance here at the seat of Government and elsewhere to win an honest and comfortable livelihood. I hope the committee will seriously consider this proposition. I understand not only from the debate here, but also from the voice of the country, that the women of this country who are competent to do this work would be satisfied with $900 a year, and I understand by bills and propositions constantly thrust upon this House that male clerks with families cannot live upon their present salaries, and are therefore continually asking for an increase.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AXTELL. For a question only.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman whether he does not think the women are worth more in Idaho and Montana to raise children than here? [Laughter.]

Mr. AXTELL. I think that remark is not respectful to the ladies of Washington or to the women of America. Whenever they have acquired for themselves that honorable standing and position that opens the means of livelihood that will give to them men fit and worthy to be fathers to their children, I do not doubt they will become worthy and happy mothers. I hope they will here and elsewhere.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. So do I.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. KELSEY, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Forty temporary clerks, at $1,200 each, $24,000.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to strike out that paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to insert after line six hundred and ninety-seven, the following:

For thirteen copyists of drawings, at $1,000 each, $13,000; for fifty-three female copyists, at $700 each, $37,100.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the pay $720. That will be even $60 a month.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$700" and inserting "$900" in lieu thereof. I do it for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from New York why he makes a distinction; why these clerks should not receive the same pay as clerks in other Departments receive?

Mr. KELSEY. Because these clerks are mere copyists, and the committee fixed their pay at $700.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. But the clerks employed in other Departments are copyists too. Men are employed in other Departments at $1,200 a year who do not do as much work as these clerks do. I object to the distinction. I do not understand the policy of this Committee on Appropriations, this cutting and slashing and making distinctions in the different Departments.

Mr. KELSEY. The Committee on Appropriations make a distinction according to the labor performed by the clerks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, the labor is writing, and just exactly the same kind of writing that is done in the other Departments at $900 a year. Why make a distinction? If these clerks are to have only $700 a year, put the others down to $700. But there is manifest injustice in slashing about and cutting down here and covering up there, knocking a man down in one Department and knocking a man up in another, raising a salary here and lowering one there. I do object to it.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that these clerks were formerly paid by the folio. They will get much better pay if they are paid a salary in this way. They will not be so liable to be cheated as they were before. It was for the protection of these ladies that the committee concluded to pay them a salary, and under this system they will get better pay than they did under the old one. The money which we appropriate will all go to them instead of being divided between them and somebody else.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on all these paragraphs relating to the Patent Office.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. For the purpose of restoring the work in the Patent Office to its present condition I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last clause and inserting "for copyists, $68,600."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I now move to amend the paragraph beginning on line seven hundred and four, by striking out "five" and inserting "seven," and by striking out "$4,500" and inserting "$6,800;" so that it will read:

For seven skilled laborers at $900 each, $6,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to strike out line seven hundred and eleven, as follows:

For one laborer, $240,

and to insert in lieu thereof,

For seven laborers at $600 each, $4,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to amend in line seven hundred and sixteen by striking out the words "and so forth, and so forth" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and other contingencies;" so that the paragraph will read:

For contingent expenses of the Patent Office, namely, for illustrations of annual report, stationery for use of office, printing patents, furniture for rooms, repairs, advertising, books for library, international exchanges, plumbing, gas-fitting, and other contingencies, $120,000, and no further or greater sum shall be paid or contracted to be paid for said contingent expenses; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to make a full and detailed report to each December session of Congress of the manner in which said contingent expenses have been disbursed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, and also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of the funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, including legal assistance to the Attorney General, and other special and extraordinary expenditures in cases of the Supreme Court of the United States in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the safe-keeping of prisoners, $1,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move, by instructions of the Committee on Appropriations, to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$1,000,000" and inserting "$1,500,000." That is a decrease of $500,000 from last year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

War Department:

For compensation of the Secretary of War, $8,000; chief clerk; four clerks of class four; for additional to one clerk of class four, as disbursing clerk, $200; for seven clerks of class three; three clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; one messenger; three assistant messengers; one laborer, $46,560.

Office of Adjutant General:

For three clerks of class four, nine clerks of class three, twenty-seven clerks of class two, twenty-six clerks of class one, and two messengers, $90,480.

Office of Quartermaster General:

For four clerks of class four; eight clerks of class three; twenty clerks of class two; seventy-five clerks of class one; thirty copyists; superintendent of the building, $200; one messenger; two assistant messengers; and six laborers, $171,040.

Office of Paymaster General:

For chief clerk; four clerks of class four; one clerk of class three; also three clerks of class three, authorized by clause in the act of February 25, 1863, $4,800; Provided, That said clerks shall not be continued after the 30th of June, 1870; twenty-six clerks of class two, thirty clerks of class one, and two messengers, $68,660.

Mr. KELSEY. At the suggestion of the chief clerk of the Paymaster General's office, I move to strike out all of the paragraph just read under the head "office of Paymaster General," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

1 chief clerk at $2,200.....	$2,200
5 division clerks at $2,000.....	10,000
4 clerks of class four at $1,800.....	7,200
20 clerks of class three at $1,600.....	32,000
21 clerks of class two at $1,400.....	29,400
6 clerks of class one at $1,200.....	7,200

It will be observed that very nearly precisely the same amount, a little less, is appropriated by the amendment I have offered that is proposed by the paragraph in the bill. I move this amendment at the suggestion of the chief clerk of the Paymaster's office. While he reduces the number of clerks he increases their grade and pays them better. There is great complaint that many of these clerks are inadequately paid. He thinks the department will be more efficient if the number of clerks is reduced and clerks of a higher grade are employed.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire what assurance we have that at another session we will not be asked for more clerks, and that this is but an indirect way of raising the salary of clerks under the pretense of reducing their number? What assurance have we that at another session they will not come in here and ask for an increase of the number of clerks?

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] another question. The provision in the bill contains this clause:

Also three clerks of class three, authorized by clause in the act of February 25, 1863, $4,800; Provided, That said clerks shall not be continued after the 30th of June, 1870.

Why does that clause disappear from the amendment? Why is it not kept in? I would like to be informed upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. KELSEY; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Commissary General:

For one clerk of class four, one clerk of class three, ten clerks of class two, twenty clerks of class one, one messenger, and two laborers, $43,440.

Office of the Surgeon General:

For one clerk of class four, one clerk of class three, two clerks of class two, ten clerks of class one, one messenger, and one laborer, $19,640.

Office of chief engineer:

For four clerks of class four, four clerks of class three, four clerks of class two, three clerks of class one, two messengers, and one laborer, $25,080.

Office of chief of ordnance:

For two clerks of class four, one clerk of class three, four clerks of class two, six clerks of class one, and one messenger, $18,840.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to strike out the clause under the head of "office of chief of ordnance" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For chief clerk, three clerks of class four, three clerks of class three, five clerks of class two, eight clerks of class one, and one messenger, $28,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Military Justice:

For one clerk of class four, one clerk of class three, one clerk of class two, and two clerks of class one, $7,200.

Signal office:

For two clerks of class two, $2,800.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to insert the following after the clause just read:

Office of Inspector General and Inspector of the Military Academy:
One clerk of class four, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent Expenses of the War Department.

Office of the Secretary of War:

For blank-books, stationery, labor, books, maps, extra clerk hire, and miscellaneous items, $10,000.

Office of the Adjutant General:

For blank books, stationery, binding, and miscellaneous items, $15,000.

Office of the Quartermaster General:

For blank books, stationery, binding, and miscellaneous items, $10,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to insert after the last clause read the following:

Office of Commissary General:

For office rent, $3,800; for fuel and lights, $1,150; for repairs, $500; for two watchmen, $1,200; for two laborers, $1,200; total, $7,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the general purposes of the Navy Department building:

For compensation of five watchmen and two laborers of the building, $4,200.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "five" before "watchmen" and inserting "three;" and by striking out "$4,200" and inserting "$2,760;" so as to make the paragraph read:

For compensation of three watchmen and two laborers of the building, $2,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Agricultural statistics:

For collecting statistics and material for annual report, $10,000.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "ten" and inserting "fifteen;" so as to make the amount of the appropriation $15,000. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman having charge of this bill to the fact that the Commissioner of Agriculture had some consultation with the chairman of the committee in reference to this matter, and the committee assented to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; the amendment was agreed to in the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph the following:

For improvement of the grounds around the new agricultural building, $10,000.

I think this amendment also has the assent of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no. The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph the following:

To enable the Commissioner to continue and complete the investigation of cattle diseases, $15,000, which he is authorized to draw as soon as this act becomes a law.

Mr. Chairman, I am instructed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Agriculture to ask for this appropriation. One of the diseases especially in the view of the committee in asking the continuance of this investigation is the pleuro-pneumonia, which prevailed so extensively in Massachusetts three years ago, and which, as I am informed by one of the members from that State, cost the State $60,000 to get rid of it. The disease prevails to-day in four or five of the States intervening between Massachusetts and here, and is daily extending, so that it threatens to spread itself over the whole country. Within the last two or three weeks I have myself seen evidence of the prevalence of this disease all around us. There is scarcely a dairy in the vicinity of this city where it is not found. It is constantly spreading. Yet the disease is entirely curable and preventable. All that is necessary is that it be properly investigated and that the community be sufficiently informed as to the method of treatment. The Commissioner proposes that a thorough investigation shall be made.

In the next place it is contemplated to investigate the Texas cattle-fever, which prevailed so extensively in the western States last summer and fall, causing a loss during the season of over three million dollars in the actual deaths of cattle. This disease prevailed to such an extent as to create almost a panic in the public mind. The Board of Health of Chicago, the Board of Health of New York, the State authorities of Illinois and Ohio all took action directing public attention to this subject. I have some statistics with regard to the losses by this disease, which I might submit to the committee. There is no doubt that unless the disease be investigated and the necessary steps taken for its prevention it will be upon us again during the coming summer. The Commissioner ordered some time ago an investigation, which has progressed to some extent so far as to satisfy him and those engaged with him that the investigation must be made further south; that it must be made in the region where the disease originated. He is now able to avail himself of the services of a very scientific and thoroughly educated veterinarian, whom he desires to send to Texas where the disease prevails. The investigation has gone so far as to satisfy this investigator that the disease prevails in Texas and comes from there. The Commissioner of Agriculture desires to avail himself of this investigation immediately before the Texas cattle are moved to the North. I think I shall have the support of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I thought my friend's argument was more potent than it is. I agree that Massachusetts paid $60,000, but we came to one conclusion—that when we stopped the commission the disease stopped. [Laughter.] That was the general conclusion so far as I understand it. I appeal to my colleague, in whose county it started, whether I am not right? If we investigated it as a State let every other State investigate it. Why should we put it upon the Government? Why should we get up a commission to bring together the statistics from the different State agricultural societies to put them in a report next year on the subject? We have an Agricultural Department, and they have full power to investigate this matter.

The Committee on Appropriations heard an argument on this subject. My friend said all that could be said on the subject, and he thought he had convinced us, but unfortunately he did not convince us.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes thirty-three, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I renew the amendment, reducing the amount as follows:

After line nine hundred and ninety-eight insert the following:

To enable the Commissioner to continue and complete the investigation of cattle diseases, $10,000; which he is authorized to draw as soon as this act becomes a law.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I make the point of order that this is not germane to the paragraph to which it is moved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is all under the head of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, not desiring to antagonize the Committee on Agriculture in this matter with the Committee on Appropriations I appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and presented this subject to them. There were nine members present who requested me to bring this up in the House. They assented to it. I desire to say to this Committee of the Whole that the investigation of the Committee on Agriculture on this subject satisfies us that there is a general loss of stock of the country by curable diseases of over fifty million dollars, and that by taking proper action on the subject will enable us to save at least twenty-five per cent. of that loss. Not to resort to the means within our reach to secure this great saving upon the actual total loss in the stock of the country, because it will cost something in pursuing a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy. I am directed by unanimous vote of the Committee on Agriculture to submit this amendment, and it seems to me that it should need no more than the presentation of facts to secure for it the vote of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the gentleman from Michigan know that the agricultural societies of the West have investigated this subject; and does he not know there are as able men attached to those societies as there are in the Agricultural Department in Washington?

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. No, sir; I do not know it. The President of the English veterinary society is in the United States, and his services can now be engaged. There is no regular veterinary surgeon in the United States. The Department of Agriculture can avail itself of the services of this one, and I think it should be allowed to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is a proposition to pay some veterinary surgeon to make this investigation to be published in the agricultural report next year.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I make no such proposition. This money is needed so that this investigation shall take place in Texas before the cattle are moved to the North. Unless it is done I am sure that as soon as the grass grows and the spring opens this disease will advance with the Texas cattle to the Northwest.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not rise the purpose of discussing this proposition any further than to say, as one of the Committee on Agriculture, that I dissent from it in toto. The chairman states that he has been authorized by the committee to offer it. I have never heard of it before to-night.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, it was the action of the committee one day when he retired and said to us whatever we decided upon he would assent to. Therefore I gave his assent to the decision of a large majority of the committee present.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am entirely satisfied with the explanation of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I did not intend to impugn his action at all in the matter; I know he intended to do right. But I will say in addition to what I have said that I not only dissent in toto from this provision, but I do not think this Congress ought to set itself up in the business of cow doctoring. One or two sessions ago it set itself up in the business of horse doctoring, and paid some gentleman whose name I do not remember $25,000 a year to look after the hoofs of horses in the military service. That gentleman is riding over the country feeding 'on the fat of the land, or traveling in Europe upon the salary that we pay him for doctoring horses' feet. Now, it is proposed to give $15,000 to some fellow to look after diseases of cattle. Mr. Chairman, there is not an old farmer in California or in the country anywhere who does not consider himself competent to attend to the doctoring of his own cattle. That is something every farmer professes to understand, and I think Congress had better let that question alone, particularly when the Treasury is in the condition it is at present.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope we will take a vote on the amendment. I think all has been said that is necessary.

The amendment of Mr. TROWBRIDGE was disagreed to—ayes thirty-three, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For labor and repairs in the experimental garden and purchase of plants for the same, $10,000.

Mr. STOVER. I move to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000." I think, in the present impaired condition of the finances, we should not needlessly expend any money. As far as my experience goes, all these plants that we have procured and cultivated at enormous expense in our experimental garden are nothing more than what grows wild all over our western prairies. If we are in favor of economy I think we ought to commence somewhere. We have been talking about it but have not been making a commencement.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have expended a large sum in this experimental garden. I suppose it is the intention of Congress to keep it up. The committee so understood it, and have reported this item as the smallest possible expenditure.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes seventeen, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of new and valuable seeds and labor in putting them up, $20,000.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to increase the amount to $40,000. I am willing to concede that a good deal of money has been wasted in the purchase of seeds for the Agricultural Department. But, sir, I am as well satisfied that a very considerable amount of money can be used to the very great satisfaction of the country and with eminent satisfaction to the farmers of the country in the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds. It is a well demonstrated fact, and every intelligent farmer understands it, that a constant interchange of seeds is necessary in every portion of the country for all kinds of planting, at least for all kinds that I am at all familiar with. Now, this interchange can better be initiated at all events here at Washington in a separate Department, like that we now have, than it can be by separate action of State or local agricultural societies. We have expended a large amount of money in the erection of a building for this Agricultural Department. It is a very creditable building and does honor to the Government and to those who have charge of its erection.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. What has that to do with garden seeds?

Mr. NIBLACK. It is a building of very considerable size, in which a large amount of business can be transacted. If, then, we intend to keep up this building and make it of any service to the people of the country we must have it occupied in some way in connection with the purpose for which it was erected. If it be the intention of Congress to so cut down and cripple the operations of this department by cutting down the appropriations then we had better sell out this building and get rid of it; it is no use to keep so large an edifice for purposes so insignificant as the appropriation in this bill indicates. There is no branch of the public service in which the great mass of the people in the agricultural and rural districts take so much interest as this Agricultural Department. They look upon it with peculiar pride and pleasure. They read everything with absorbing interest that comes from it. They receive every paper of seeds that is transmitted to them, either by members of Congress or by anybody else connected with the Government here, with the greatest interest, and cultivate them with the most sedulous care.

I can say, I think, with truth, that within the last month half the letters which I have received—and the number is not very inconsiderable I assure you—have been either in regard to the agricultural report, asking for copies of it or in regard to seeds and plants and other matters connected with the Agricultural Department. It was the intention of Congress some years ago when they authorized this building to make the building an ornament to the Government. It was their intention to make the Department one of usefulness and service to the people. If we really intend to do that we must appropriate some money for the purpose. If we do not intend to do that, then we may just as well sell the building and allow this Department to occupy some insignificant corner in some other building, as it used to do, in the Patent Office building.

Mr. MULLINS. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the amount $41,000. I offer this amendment to give a few ideas in regard to the material question under consideration. The provision in the bill is as follows:

For purchase of new and valuable seeds and labor in putting them up, $20,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my judgment we are upon one of the most important clauses in this bill. I ask the question of every member of this House, what is it that constitutes you a nation? What is it that makes you wealthy? To what must you look for the extinguishment of your national debt? I ask you if it is not the agricultural interests of your country? If your wealth lies in mines and mechanics, who is to feed your miners and mechanics? There is a terrible splutter made here every now and then about equalizing labor and doing justice to the ladies. If any man here feels more disposed to do that than I am he is entirely theirs and none of his own. [Laughter.] But tell me what will give your ladies more satisfaction than to find the harvest fields clothed in glorious luxury with the richest of harvests? What is it that makes your ladies and children look fine? It is that there are rich crops. You cannot have that without good seed. When you have that, then, my dear sir, when you go home your lady welcomes you to the warm fireside, and when you go to the supper table you find there the products of your labor. By expending a few thousand dollars you realize that, and it is a realization worth talking about. But without it you find only a little hoe cake there about a quarter of an inch thick, [laughter,] and the children crying. And the next thing is the children have to be bound out to some trade, a saddler's or tailor's, for any trade is better than starving to death.

I trust, sir, that we shall increase this appropriation for the purchase and putting up of seeds to be distributed among our constituents, male and female. If there is any one solitary point in this bill that deserves more attention than any other, and which your constituents will give you more credit for than for any other act, it is this appropriation to send seeds all over our land, not little footy, dried-up, chaffy seed, but good, sound, plump, full seed, ears of corn as big as wagon hubs, and grain as big as iron wedges. And you will have none of these little crops that you had last year; you will not then have the wife fighting the husband and Barney belaboring the hooked cow that is so ugly because there is not enough for her to eat. [Laughter.] Give us this seed; give us the money to buy it. Other countries will know what you are for; they will look and see your harvests and go and do likewise.

You cannot expect, gentlemen, and it is nonsense to calculate that you can plant the same seed on the same ground for fifteen or twenty years without its becoming deteriorated. You must change the seed; and how are you to do that without you foster the Agricultural Department? If you do that the whole United States will benefit by it. You should not expect more of the Agricultural Department than can honestly be asked of you. You cannot buy seeds without you have the means. When you have the means you can then buy seeds and distribute them to your constituents, who will rejoice and say that you have done right.

Mr. MILLER. This Agricultural Department is the most popular throughout the country of any Department connected with our Government, and it should be fostered by Congress. The proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is to give $20,000 for the purpose of purchasing new and valuable seeds, putting them up, and distributing them over the country. It must be remembered that at this time these seeds must be distributed not only throughout the loyal States but also throughout the entire United States; and all that is provided by this bill for the purpose of purchasing and distributing over all the country new and valuable seeds is $20,000. Now, I ask gentlemen here if that is sufficient? If you want to foster the agricultural interests of this country, is $20,000 sufficient for the purpose of purchasing seeds? I know it has been said, and truly said by gentlemen, that a portion of the seeds heretofore purchased and distributed by that Department were of little value; that they comprised kinds that the people already had in plenty. But the proposition now is to purchase new and valuable seeds, not the kinds heretofore complained of. One gentleman asks, when are you going to get these seeds? I say we ought to get them immediately and distribute them.

Now, the question is what sum is necessary for this purpose? The Committee on Appropriations propose to give only $20,000 for purchasing, putting up, and distributing new and valuable seeds throughout the agricultural districts of the United States. Now, I appeal to every member here to say if that is enough, if that is sufficient? A demand is now made from every section of the country upon the Commissioner of Agriculture for valuable seeds, and what is his response? "We have none; Congress has not furnished us with the means of purchasing seeds, and we cannot do so; we can only give a very small portion of seeds to each member of Congress for distribution." I propose, therefore, that you give a sufficient appropriation to sustain that Department, the most important of our Government. I am, therefore, in favor of raising the amount proposed here.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now ask that debate may be considered as closed on this paragraph.

No objection was made.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn; and the amendment of Mr. NIBLACK, increasing the amount to $40,000, was not agreed to.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to amend by inserting after the clause last read what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretaries of State, War, Navy, Treasury, and Interior, the Postmaster and Attorney Generals, Commissioner of Agriculture, Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the officers of the House and Senate, to severally cause to be made alphabetical lists of all the employes in their respective Departments or forces, and to correct the same as changes shall be made, and to keep said lists in their several offices, respectively, subject to inspection.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That said lists shall contain the name, rank, and pay of the employes of the respective Departments or forces, date of employment, and residence, giving town, county, State, or Territory, designating those who have served in the Army or Navy of the United States.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the several congressional districts, organized Territories, and the District of Columbia shall be entitled to equal numbers and ranks of employes in the said several Departments and forces. No district or Territory shall have more than one of any rank until every district and Territory, as herein provided for, shall have at least one of the same rank; and all appointments in said Departments and forces hereafter shall be to equalize the number and rank of employes, as above provided for; said equalization of numbers and rank of employes from the several districts and Territories aforesaid shall be made by the 4th day of March, 1871: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to regulate the employment and service of day laborers and boys under the age of sixteen years.

Mr. KELSEY. I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend by striking out "twenty" and inserting "thirty," so as to make this appropriation for seeds $30,000. The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce the compensation of any employes of the Government below the amount allowed in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I make the point of order that this amendment proposes new legislation, and is not in order on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The amendment is clearly a limitation on the construction of the bill. It does not affect other legislation.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I confess to the House that this amendment is aimed at the proviso—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must state to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PETERS] that the amendment is not debatable.

Mr. PETERS. Why not?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending paragraph, including amendments to the paragraph, has been closed. This amendment, although offered as a new section, is considered as an amendment to the pending paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes eighty-five, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Branch mint at San Francisco, California:
For salaries of superintendent, treasurer, assayer, melter and refiner, coiners, and six clerks, $30,500.
For wages of workmen and adjusters, $150,000.

Mr. AXTELL. I move to amend the paragraph last read by striking out "$150,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$191,450." I desire to state to the committee that the sum which my amendment proposes to appropriate for these workmen and adjusters was allowed last year, and, as I understand, was found to be necessary. The sum which the bill proposes to appropriate for salaries of superintendent, treasurer, assayer, &c., is the same as that appropriated last year, $30,500. The amount appropriated by the bill for incidental and contingent expenses, &c., is also the same as last year, $69,000 in round numbers. This reduction of nearly forty-two thousand dollars is merely a blind, unreasoning cutting down under pretense of economy.

Now, sir, to carry out a just economy I will go "as far as he who goes the farthest." The word "economy," properly understood, means management, not simple hoarding. Economy on the part of the Government means the carrying on of all Government works with a just and liberal spirit toward the public employes, and particularly providing money enough to keep up those works in a proper manner.

The superintendent of the mint at San Francisco is no political or personal friend of mine; he is a gentleman with whom I never exchanged one word; but I know his character in the community, and he is as estimable, honorable, and upright a gentleman as there is in the city of San Francisco. He requires for properly carrying on that mint with its increasing business a certain sum of money which the Committee on Appropriations propose to cut down to the extent of $40,000. I desire that before this reduction be made the committee should at least inform us of the reasons of their action.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Chairman, the remarks I intend to make on the amendment may as well be made here, perhaps, as at any other point. I observe, from the estimates in reference to the independent Treasury and the paragraphs in the bill, that the Committee on Appropriations cut down these appropriations uniformly below the estimates for this and the appropriations of last year. I understand from a member of that committee that they have done this arbitrarily; they have done it without any evidence produced before them; they have done it from their own conceit as to what economy ought to be practiced. I have confidence, unbounded confidence almost, in the superior sagacity and the superior wisdom and profound knowledge of that committee, but when they overrule the estimates of the Departments of this Government, and when they undertake to cut down these appropriations below those of last year I know it will, if carried out, result in our having a deficiency bill next year. We have a deficiency bill of many millions now pending.

I say they are starting on an experiment with reference to the next Administration that is dangerous. General Grant has indicated his determination to enter upon an economical administration of the Government. I propose to give him an opportunity to exercise that economy. I do not propose to be controlled by the great wisdom of the great committee of ours in cutting down all the estimates of the effective general officers of the Government without any evidence. In the case of the San Francisco mint they have cut it down. In the case of the sub-Treasury at Boston they have cut down the appropriation from $25,000 to $15,000. In New York it was $110,000 last year, and they have cut it down to $75,000. The appropriation for the independent Treasury at Philadelphia last year was $24,850, and in this bill it has been cut down. These estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury were based upon the estimates of the officers at the several points named, but the profound wisdom, the intuitive sagacity, which enables them to grasp this economy enables them to scale the appropriation for Boston down $10,000, New York $50,000, and Philadelphia $15,000, without any evidence laid before them, as I am informed by the senior member of that committee. I do not propose to follow the Committee on Appropriations any further. I propose to adopt the estimates of the Departments unless the Committee on Appropriations can show cause why they should be reduced; Unless they have evidence showing why they should be reduced I do not propose to follow them in this false economy, which is to result in our having deficiency bills here at the next session.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is an increase—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment to the amendment? Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out all but the first word of the amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the first word?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. "One."

Mr. BROOKS. Debate must be confined to that word.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; I have moved to strike out all but that. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say that in 1856 the House commenced cutting down the expenses of the mint at San Francisco. They have cut them down every year since, and from that time to this there has not been a deficiency. We have made such a reduction as seemed to be in exact ratio with what they have been able to get along with. I desire to say no more on that part of the amendment; but I do not think the House wish to raise the appropriation for the San Francisco mint to $50,000.

My friend from the Lancaster district of Pennsylvania says that we have done this arbitrarily, without evidence. He is not quite correct. Let me tell him that in 1860, in Philadelphia, they had but one clerk at $1,500 in the sub-Treasury. We have now given them $15,000. In Boston there was one clerk at $1,500, and we have now given them $24,000.

Mr. DICKEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield, as I have not the time. In New York in 1860 they had $24,000, but they have run it up to $157,000 and we have cut it down to $60,000. Now, what was the meaning of all this? It was that in 1862 a law was passed allowing just as many clerks to be appointed at just such salaries as the Secretary of the Treasury would agree to; and of course he agreed to a whole raft of them, and so the expense of this independent Treasury ran up more than quadruple.

Now, some gentleman says to me, "Why, very much more money now passed through the Treasury." Why, sir, it does not require but a moment more to put down a million than it does $100,000. The amount does not make the difference. We have run up under that pernicious law—for all laws are pernicious that allow offices to be accumulated by any one man to the extent they have in this case—we have run up the expenses of the sub-Treasuries and some of the offices connected with them almost indefinitely. The committee after full revision of the whole subject endeavored to bring to it the best judgment they could, and with no other interest than every other member of the House can have; no other interest than that which every member of the community has. Now, if gentlemen have any other or different knowledge than what comes to the committee of course they will vote upon that knowledge. But I pray gentlemen not to vote because a gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks it necessary to stand up for his State, or a gentleman from New York or elsewhere thinks it necessary to stand up for his State, or a gentleman of a given committee thinks it necessary to protect a Department of which his committee have charge. We of the Committee on Appropriations have no Department in charge. We have no constituency but the great people; we have no interest for any one except simply to give our best judgment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to say one thing in reply to my colleague, [Mr. DICKEY,] not to defend the committee whom he has assailed with some sharpness, because I am satisfied that when he has been here longer he will learn to have a better appreciation of the industry and labor of others and perhaps less confidence in his own intuitive knowledge of things, such as he says the committee have, than he has now. It is almost always the result of experience here that members learn to respect those with whom they are associated who have acquired in the House a reputation for industry and the faithful performance of their duty, and I am sure my colleague will learn in that school after awhile, because I know his high character at home, to appreciate the labors of others. But what I intended to reply to particularly was the statement made by him that possibly we would not need the large appropriations which he advocates; that possibly the necessities of the country will not demand it; but he says, "Give General Grant an opportunity to expend less money than the House appropriates, and so let the country see that he is an economical President." He proposes to make the appropriations larger than may be required so as to enable the President to make a reputation for economy. I hope the Republican members of the House will not be governed by any such policy. Let us perform our duty independently. When the necessities of the country demand a larger appropriation let us make it larger, and when they will admit of a smaller one let us make it smaller. General Grant has reputation enough for economy already without adding to it by any such clap-trap as that. The best way always is to be direct and straightforward, and leave it to the country and to time to appreciate our motives and approve our action.

•Mr. DICKEY. Will my colleague answer me a question?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DICKEY. Will he or any gentleman on the Committee on Appropriations tell me upon what evidence they cut down the appropriation last year for the independent Treasury at New York from $110,000 to $75,000, and that of Philadelphia from $24,850 to $15,000?

Mr. SCOFIELD. That question is not now before the committee. When it is, and that is the direct subject of inquiry, he will receive a fitting answer. If he had asked me about the one that is now pending, the appropriation for the mint at San Francisco—

Mr. DICKEY. Excuse me; I will ask it. Upon what grounds were the appropriations of last year and the estimate for this year for the mint at San Francisco cut down?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I was just going to answer that question before the gentleman asked it. The committee did have some evidence of the amount of business which this mint is performing and the expense in which it involves the country, and comparing the amount of work done with the amount of expense and comparing it with the mints at other places they came to the conclusion that the country could not afford and the mint did not require so large an expenditure of money. Much of this evidence that comes to the committee is parol evidence. We cannot always get it from the Departments. The head of the Department gets it from a clerk, and the clerk gets it from reports made by men interested in California; and with no desire to curtail the expenses in any particular portion of the country the committee have to weigh all the evidence that appears in the case and then present their best judgment to the House for its approval.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. AXTELL. I vary my amendment so that it will make the clause read:

For wages of workmen and adjusters, $175,000.

I propose to press a vote upon this amendment in the hope that the committee will sustain my present proposition to increase the sum allowed by the Committee on Appropriations $25,000 only. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] who last occupied the floor will give me his attention, I desire to say to him and to the committee that the salaries of superintendent, treasurer, assayer, melter and refiner, coiner, and six clerks remain as last year at $30,500, showing that the business at the mint is rather on the increase than on the decrease. The salaries of these officers remain the same. The appropriation for incidental and contingent expenses, repairs, and wastage, remains at $69,545, the same as last year. But when you come to the wages of workmen and adjusters, the poor men employed in the mint, for which last year we gave $175,000—although the superintendent asked $191,000—they reduce the amount to $125,000.

Now, I understand from the gentleman who has charge of this bill that the superintendent has come out without any deficiency—that he got through with the $175,000. I presume he can go through another year with that amount, but I do not think he could do with less than that. While the salaries of all the officers about the mint remain the same, and the contingent expenses remain as last year, do not let us cut off the workmen. I do not desire to trespass upon the patience of the committee. I desire a vote on my amendment, and I would be highly gratified if the committee would give us for the workmen the same amount which they gave us last year.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on this proposition.

Mr. HIGBY. I object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield for three minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIGBY. I want five minutes under the rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. HIGBY. The method in which, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us, the Committee on Appropriations obtained information on which to make the appropriation for this purpose is very strange. He says that the committee do not place full reliance upon the information acquired through those who have charge of the Mint and its operation because it comes from interested parties, but they do rely upon the parol evidence which they receive outside of the information they get from those parties. The member from Pennsylvania, who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, has given us nothing satisfactory upon this subject. He tells us to be sure that they had parol testimony. What is that? It is the declarations of individuals who appear before the committee. Is that evidence? We have the statements of the sworn officers of the Government before us, and I say that it is unsafe to go below what we find in their estimates. Here are the estimates:

Branch Mint at San Francisco, California.

For salaries of superintendent and treasurer, at $4,500, act of July 3, 1852, (10 Laws, page 11, sec. 2),	$9,000;
assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, at $3,000, (same act.)	$9,000;
six clerks, one at $2,500, five at $2,000 each, per same act, August 4, 1854, (10 Laws, pages 11, 201, 553.)	$12,500.....
For wages of workmen and adjusters.....	$30,500 00
For incidental and contingent expenses, including wastage on gold and silver.....	122,000 00

Total amount of appropriations required, $347,950 00

Now, sir, it is true that last year the amount appropriated was $175,000 in place of this item of $195,450.

Now, what does the superintendent of the branch mint at San Francisco say upon this subject? He says:

"You will notice that I have not made the usual deduction for the parting charge collected from depositors, which source of revenue has since the establishment of the branch been made available to be applied toward the expenses. I learn that a law was passed at the recent session of Congress requiring that hereafter all the available profits of the Mint and branches shall be covered into the Treasury, to be expended only by a specific appropriation. Whether the revenue derived from a charge made against the depositor of bullion for parting the same can be considered as profits is extremely questionable; but to provide against an adverse decision of the Department upon this point I have deemed it most wise not to permit that item to enter into the calculation of my estimates.

"I will take the opportunity to say that my figures are as nearly accurate as I can possibly make them, and that it would not be safe to reduce them."

Now, when he says that he learns that such a law was passed he states what is true. Such a law was passed to cover all the receipts of the Mint and branches into the Treasury.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] tells us that the Committee on Appropriations cut down the amount last year to $175,000 and there was no deficiency. Therefore upon that ground they propose to cut down the amount this year still lower. And the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] tells us that they took parol testimony or declarations outside of the statements they obtained from these Departments, and that is the kind of testimony upon which the Committee on Appropriations have brought in during the last ten days of this session one of the most important bills before the House. They have made a mighty struggle, and this is what is brought forth by that committee during the last ten days of the session. They will not take the statements which they get from the department in San Francisco, verified by the Treasury Department in this city, but they have been laboring all this time getting outside testimony, parol testimony, on this subject. That seems to have been the business and labor of the great Appropriation Committee of this House down to the last days of this session. I trust the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. AXTELL] will be sustained by the Committee of the Whole as it should be. This superintendent is a man of integrity and unimpeachable character, and it is beyond the power of the Committee on Appropriations to bring any charge against his character for integrity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to; and the amendment of Mr. AXTELL was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Branch mint at Denver:
For assayer, (who shall have charge of said mint,) $1,800.
For melter and refiner and coiner, at $1,800 each, $3,600.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend the clause last read so that it will read:

For melter, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For two clerks at $1,800 each, $3,600.
For wages of workmen, $12,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $3,000: Provided, That after the 1st day of July, 1869, the branch mint at Denver shall be carried on as an assay office only, and all unexpended balance of appropriations shall be paid and covered into the Treasury of the United States; and all the offices not herein provided for are hereby abolished.

Mr. CHILCOTT. I move to strike out all relating to the branch mint at Denver and to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. KELSEY. I raise the point of order that some of the paragraphs have already been passed and cannot now be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The paragraph relating to incidental and contingent expenses is the only paragraph now pending.

Mr. CHILCOTT. Then I raise the point of order that the proviso of the pending paragraph is new legislation and not in order upon this appropriation bill, and is changing existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CHILCOTT. I move to insert after the paragraph last read what I send to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For superintendent, $2,000; assayer, $1,800; melter and refiner, $1,800; three clerks, one of whom shall act as clerk to the Assistant Treasurer of the United States of the branch mint, $5,400; wages of workmen, $11,000; incidental and contingent expenses, $2,400; additional salary of superintendent for services as Assistant Treasurer of the United States, $500, or so much thereof as shall be necessary: Provided, The entire expenses of the branch mint at Denver for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated.

Mr. CHILCOTT. I trust the Committee on Appropriations will not oppose this amendment. As I understand their proposition it is to change this into an assay office for the purpose of saving expenses to the Government. Now, I offer an amendment continuing this as a branch mint, at an expense less than that proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. The usual appropriation for the mint at the city of Denver has been between thirty and forty thousand dollars. The Committee on Appropriations propose to reduce it to an assay office, at an expense of $26,300. I propose to retain it as a branch mint, but at an expense even less than the committee propose, $24,900. We desire to preserve this as a mint for the purpose of a Government depository. When the mining products of Colorado are increasing, and increased last year between two and three hundred thousand dollars, we think it is not proper to reduce it to an assay office; and inasmuch as we propose to carry it on at a less expense than the committee propose for an assay office, I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to state another point. The assayer, who it is proposed shall have the whole charge of this mint, gives bonds to the Government in the sum of $10,000. If he be intrusted with the management of this mint there will pass through his hands during the next fiscal year bullion amounting to perhaps $1,000,000. In view of this fact, I ask whether it is proper to change this mint to an assay office, intrusting the assayer with this vast amount when he gives bonds in the sum of only $10,000? I hope the amendment will be adopted.

On agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 23, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he allow this amendment to be considered adopted, and then have a vote in the House upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; I will allow a vote to be taken on it in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina:
For the care and preservation of the branch mint buildings, machinery, and materials, at Charlotte, North Carolina, including $500 for necessary repairs, $1,000.

Mr. DEWEESE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "one" and inserting "three," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $3,000. This mint is now under the charge of an assayer, appointed by the President upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and confirmed by the Senate. It is necessary that the increased appropriation proposed in my amendment should be made in order to pay the salary of this assayer and to meet the other contingent expenses of this mint. It is situated right in the center of our large gold region which is now being explored, very considerable sums of money being expended for that purpose. If the committee will agree that this appropriation shall now be increased to $3,000, I will promise that if by next year the mint shall have failed to return an income to the Government I will, when the appropriation bill comes up next session, no longer contend that the assayer at this mint shall be continued. The Legislature of my State addressed a respectful petition to Congress asking that this office might be kept up for one year longer; but through some negligence of our State officers that petition never reached this body. This assayer having been confirmed and commissioned, and having gone to that place to attend to his duties, I most earnestly urge the committee that the assay office may be permitted to continue for one year longer.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MUNGEN.]

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Chairman, if I held the floor in my own right I would move to strike out this whole paragraph.

Mr. DEWEESE. I thought the gentleman was going to advocate my amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MUNGEN] desire to oppose the amendment?

Mr. MUNGEN. I do; and I will give my reasons for opposing it. There has not been a half dollar or a dime or a five-cent piece coined at that mint within the last sixteen years. The gentleman's own company in the Army borrowed the fence belonging to the place and failed to bring it back again. [Laughter.] The gentleman, I understood, says there is a garden there, but he admits that the fence is gone. The act of July 23, 1866, contains a provision in regard to this mint to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. It is as follows:

For checks and certificates of deposit for office of Assistant Treasurer at New York and other offices, $18,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to remove the whole or any portion of the machinery, apparatus, and fixtures of the branch mints of the United States at New Orleans, Charlotte, and Dahlonega, to such other branch mints as in his opinion may require the same, or at his discretion to discontinue the branch mint at New Orleans, Charlotte, and Dahlonega, and to dispose of the property belonging thereto, if he shall deem it expedient, at public auction to the highest bidder.

Now, the fact in regard to this mint is that the confederates took possession of the building and used it as a workshop. After the close of the war the machinery left in it was removed by the Government to the Mint at Philadelphia. There is not a single thing there except the building, and the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to sell that. He has been authorized to sell it ever since July, 1866, and I do not know why he has not done so. I do not see why we should keep this man there to look at this building. I shall make a motion to strike it all out.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to amend the amendment by reducing it to $2,000.

Mr. Chairman, I truly hope the committee will deal liberally with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DEWESE.] He is a constituent of mine, although claiming to represent a portion of the people of the State of North Carolina. [Laughter.] He is a gentleman in whom I feel a great interest, and in whom my constituents feel a deep interest, and inasmuch as he has not been able to do much so far for the people of North Carolina I hope, as an act of friendship, we will pass this amendment for him. He votes in my district.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do they not let any man vote in the gentleman's district who will vote on the right side?

Mr. NIBLACK. We do not make any objection except on account of race or color. In every other respect we are very liberal. If the gentleman from Tennessee should attempt to vote in my district it would be a very tight squeeze. [Laughter.]

Now, as a matter of liberality and courtesy to the gentleman hailing from North Carolina, but really from my district, I hope this amendment will meet with the favorable consideration of this committee. I wish to act liberally in this matter. I wish to appeal to the House as an act of courtesy to me to adopt this amendment. It would gratify my constituents at home very much; and furthermore, I have no doubt that if we shall discover gold in North Carolina, as my friend seems to believe we will, this man will be very much needed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DEWESE. The gentleman claims me as one of his constituents. Like most of the members of his party, as he showed that he was never going to either resign or die, I had to go to North Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. If he has left my district my people are not generally aware of it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I appeal to the House to pass this bill to-night. We have only five or six pages left. If we do not debate for the sake of debate we can run through it to-night, and I pray the House to do so, as it ought to be in the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. NIBLACK. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DEWESE's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional salary of the treasurer of the branch mint at Denver, $500.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike that out.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Dakota:

For salaries of Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs, chief justice, and two associate judges, and secretary, $1,700.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to strike out "$9,700" and insert "$12,700;" so as to make the appropriation $12,700. All the other Territories are allowed $12,000 except Colorado, which has $11,800; and I do not see why Dakota should be limited to $9,700. We are often pinched and are compelled to resort to the closest economy. I make the amendment so as to make the appropriation equal to that for the other Territories.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000: Provided, That hereafter the legislative sessions of the several Territories shall only be held biennially.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out that proviso and insert the following:

That hereafter the members of both branches of the Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall be chosen for the term of two years, and the sessions of the Legislative Assemblies shall be biennial; and each territorial Legislature shall at its first session after the passage of this act make provision for carrying it into effect.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, labor, furniture, stationery, and miscellaneous items, $7,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$10,000." That is the sum estimated for the Attorney General's office. The appropriation last year was not commensurate with the demands of the office. It is, perhaps, conducted with more economy than any other in the country.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. We appropriate $7,000 and the gentleman asks $10,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is entirely mistaken; it includes the business of the Court of Claims.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Oh, no.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly it does; the clerks, messengers, and all.

Mr. AXTELL. I desire to state that in the nine Territories, for the judges' associates, and all the officers in each one of the Territories, the aggregate of all the expenses is only $10,000.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to move an amendment to the previous paragraph, in regard to the Territory of Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of the chief justice and six associate justices, $42,500.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "justices" and inserting in lieu thereof "$70,500, being $10,500 for the chief justice and $10,000 for each associate justice."

This amendment was given to me, with a request to offer it, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.] I said to him that I hardly felt at liberty to advocate it, though if the present condition of things was to continue I thought the salaries of these judges ought to be raised.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest to the gentleman to put it at $8,000. I think that would perhaps meet the approval of the committee.

Mr. POLAND. I assume no authority over the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I will, then, move to amend the amendment by striking out "$10,500" and inserting "$8,000," and making the aggregate to correspond.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was disagreed to—ayes nineteen, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of the district judges of the United States, $165,000.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move to amend by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That the salaries of the district judges of the United States for the eastern and southern district of New York shall hereafter be $5,000 a year.

A MEMBER. What are their salaries now?

Mr. CHURCHILL. Forty-five hundred dollars a year. The State judges in the city of New York are paid $10,000 a year, and the justices of the peace $6,000. Now, with the talent and industry required to fulfill the duties of the district judges of the courts of the United States in these two districts, I think it is but right and just that we should pay them at least the sum proposed in this amendment. These judges are confined to the city of New York and Brooklyn continually during the year by the duties of their office. They are compelled to live in those cities with their families, and the expense of living there is very great; and the amount of labor that they are required to do makes this increase a proper one. The number of suits that were commenced in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the year 1867 in which the United States was a party, was eight hundred and seventy-three. That is three times as many as were brought in any other district in the United States. It is but a fair example of the amount of labor performed in that district as compared with the other districts.

Mr. PILE. I rise to oppose the amendment for the reason that these judges are now paid better than the district judges of any other section of the country. The judge of the eastern district of Missouri gets $3,000 and does a very large amount of business in his court at St. Louis. A very great number of maritime cases come into that court, arising out of the large amount of navigation on the upper and lower Missouri river.

Judge Treat, who I think has as much ability as any judge of the Federal courts in the State of New York, is engaged his entire time during the entire year in the transaction of the business of that court at a salary of $3,000. The judge of the western district of the State gets also only $3,000. I do not remember what the judges of the courts in the State of Illinois get. Now, unless there can be an equalization of the salaries of these judges all over the country, based upon the amount of time they are engaged and the ability they bring to the discharge of the duties of their office, I am opposed to the increase of the salaries of these judges in New York, making them an exception. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I really hope the salaries of these two judges will be raised, and for this reason: amid the corruption that has been poured into New York, and amid all that has been said against the judges in New York, the Federal judiciary has escaped without taint or blemish, and anybody who knows the expense of living in New York knows that $4,500 is not enough. I admit that when the salaries were first fixed that amount was right, in comparison with the rest of the country. But I say again, that the only bright spot in the judiciary of New York is in the Federal judiciary, and I do hope the committee will raise these salaries. I think it would be economy. The State judges have $10,000; the city judges have $10,000; the justices of the peace have $6,000. We have two judges there who have done their whole duty, and within the two months last past they have made two decisions in favor of the internal revenue which will save millions of dollars a year to this country in taxation alone. Judge Benedict and Judge Blatchford have brought to justice those who believed they could not be brought to justice. I hope we shall show our appreciation of such services by giving them a fair increase of salary.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. Upon this subject of the salaries of district judges I have had some little experience, as it was mainly through my efforts that they were raised to what they now are. Until some two years ago the salaries of most of the district judges in the United States were $2,000 a year. They ranged from $2,000 to $5,000. The salaries of the district judges at New Orleans and in California were $5,000. No other was as much as $4,000. I believe $3,750 was the highest except those two. The salaries of more than half the district judges in the United States were but $2,000. Now, in the Senate I introduced a bill to raise the salaries of the district judges, and I proposed to put them into two classes of $4,000 and $5,000. That bill was adopted as an amendment to an appropriation bill, and it went to a committee of conference. That particular subject of the judges' salaries was a matter of conference, and the salaries of all the district judges throughout the United States were fixed as they now are, the lowest at $3,500 and the highest at $5,000. Now, I am opposed to raising the salaries of two particular judges, because we shall have to raise the others up to match them. It is said that these judges in the city of New York have to work very hard and to work all the time. So does the district judge in Boston. So does the district judge in Philadelphia. So does the district judge in Baltimore. Several of the district judges have to work as hard as have these judges in New York. They work all the time, and these judges in New York do not have to work any more. I submit that that is not much of an element in fixing a judge's salary. A judge cannot do any other business. It costs a judge as much to live and support a family when he does not work as it does when he does work, and rather more, as has been my experience. I insist that that is not much of an element in determining the amount of salary to be paid to these officers. And the idea of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that we must pay these judges in New York for being honest, I do not take any stock in at all. I insist that judges everywhere should be honest; and that we should not increase the pay of a judge merely because we find him to be an honest man. Now, if we raise the salaries of these two judges in New York we shall be pursued incessantly until we have raised the salaries of all the rest of the judges throughout the United States to correspond. I would have been better satisfied had the salaries been made last Congress somewhat higher than they were. But the salaries of these New York judges are as high in proportion as the salaries of the other district judges throughout the country. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I was one of the conferees on the part of the House on the occasion alluded to by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] The salaries as they now stand were determined upon by that committee of conference after a great deal of care and consideration, and also after a great deal of hesitation on the part of the committee. I am opposed to making any change in them at this time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POLAND. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. CHURCHILL.

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it a clause making the salary of the judge for the northern district of Illinois $6,000. And I propose to say a very few words upon that subject.

I do not concur in the suggestion of my friend from the St. Louis district [Mr. PILE] that the salaries of all these judges should be equal. I recollect the time in our State when the entire State composed but one district, and the courts were not held more than one week, or two weeks at the extreme, in a year; that was when I first went to the State. There was comparatively no business in the State. Since that time the business of the courts has grown with the growth of the State, and the development of commerce throughout the State. This is particularly the case with the business of the court in the northern part of the State. The entire business arising from the commerce of the lakes centers in the court in the northern part of the State. I know that the judge of that district is one of the most laborious judicial officers in the United States of America, working night and day and holding court the year round. I know, too, that with the expenses of living now prevailing in the city of Chicago it is utterly impossible for him to meet the current expenses of his family on his present salary of $4,500; that is within my knowledge. I know, too, that he is one of the purest and most worthy of the judicial officers that grace the bench. I ask this House to fix his salary at $6,000 a year.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to substitute for the amendment of my colleague [Mr. CHURCHILL] the following:

The clerks of the district courts of the United States for the southern and eastern districts of New York shall hereby be allowed to pay out of fees of the said clerks to the judges of said district courts the sum of $2,000 each annually, which said sum the said judges shall be allowed to receive in addition to the compensation now allowed them by law.

The effect of my substitute, if adopted, will be to make the additional compensation to the judges of $2,000 per annum payable out of the fees of the courts. Those courts last year paid into the Treasury of the United States more than twenty-five thousand dollars of surplus fees. When gentlemen speak about the services performed by judges in other districts I desire to say that we know there are no two judicial districts in the United States, State or Federal, where the same amount of business is thrown upon the judges that is thrown upon the two United States district judges in New York city. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Judge Benedict. But I have known Judge Blachford for many years; and I know there is no man of more pure personal character, of higher professional attainments, or of greater professional pride and industry. And the only wonder to me, knowing something of the amount of business thrown upon him in that court, is that he is able to endure it at all; that his health has held out to enable him to do it at all. He sits daily, having twelve stated terms during the year; and every day, when not sitting in stated term, he is doing chamber duty and hearing motions.

Now, while the supreme court judges throughout the State of New York receive by law but $3,500, in the city of New York the judges of the supreme court, of the superior court, and of the court of common pleas, are paid a salary of $10,000. Why is this? Because, as we know, $4,000 in the city of New York will not pay the house rent and buy the fuel of a man who is fit to preside in court and dispose of the great public and private interests which are decided upon by those judges. Now, although $6,000 cannot be called adequate compensation for the judges of the United States district courts performing duty in that city, it approaches nearer to the proper pay than the present allowance. The reason for making this discrimination as to judges residing in the city of New York is the greater expense of living in that city as compared with the expense throughout the State, it being impossible in fact for a man to live in that city upon the salary received by judges in the rural districts. Why, sir, the police judges in the city of New York receive $6,000. The district attorney of the very court now under consideration is paid by act of Congress $6,000, and he receives in addition fees amounting to more than his salary. The deputy clerk of that court receives under the law of Congress $5,000; yet we propose that the man upon whom the great responsibility of the court falls, who decides questions of the weight and magnitude of those referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, shall continue to be outranked in compensation by the deputy clerk, who merely keeps the records of the court and assumes no responsibility whatever. I say it is a public wrong to ask a man to discharge the duties performed by Judges Benedict and Blachford for a salary of $4,500. My friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] has spoken about the adjustment and equalization of these salaries. Let me tell him that by the adjustment of which he speaks the salaries of these judges in the city of New York were advanced the magnificent sum of $250. In gold times the salary was $3,750; and under this equalization the addition made to compensate for the changed condition of affairs in these latter days was $250.

Mr. POLAND. Was it not $750?

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir; $250 was the only increase made in the salaries of these judges.

I say it is a shame and a disgrace to ask them to perform their onerous duties for the salary they now receive.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise for the purpose of making a motion with a view to closing debate.

Mr. CULLOM. Before that is done I would like to say a word. The judge in my district now gets $3,500 a year. Since this salary was fixed there has been imposed on him an additional duty, the holding of a court at stated periods at a place three hundred miles away from the town where he resides and where his ordinary court duties are performed. I think it would be but just to grant him a small additional compensation. I would like to offer an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. If debate is in order I would like to pass a eulogy on the judge in my district. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I cheerfully assent to the proposition made by the gentleman from New York. [Mr. CHURCHILL:] but I would like to have it amended or modified so as to include the judge of the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. I wish to say in reply to my friend from New York, [Mr. POMEROY], on the other side of the House, that the proper way to estimate these salaries is to estimate them by the amount of business done in the respective courts. In the eastern district of Pennsylvania the official duties of the judge occupy his whole time. I do not know whether he hears eight hundred cases in a term, but I do know that from the beginning to the end of the year that court is open and that judge is performing his duties. He is as much entitled to $6,000 a year as the judge holding the United States district court in the city of New York.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I simply desire to close debate. After that is done gentlemen can move as many amendments as they choose.

Mr. POLAND. I object.

Mr. PILE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. PILE. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose that by unanimous consent debate shall be closed on this paragraph.

Mr. POLAND. I object.

Mr. PILE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. CULLOM's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I accept the substitute of my colleague [Mr. POMEROY] as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend by inserting the northern district of Illinois.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by including the district of Massachusetts, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the district of Maryland, the northern district of Illinois, the southern district of Ohio, and the district of Missouri.

Mr. MILLER. Include also the western district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. POLAND. I will include that also.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a point of order. We cannot establish in an appropriation bill the salary of an officer not in the Departments of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. Such have been the previous rulings.

Mr. POLAND. I will also include the district of Indiana. There is just as much reason for raising the salary of all the judges in the districts I have included in my amendment as the salary of the judges of New York. The judge in every one of those districts has to work hard all the year, and I have never heard any charge that they were not as honest as those in New York or did not make as sound decisions. I agree, in our present depreciated money condition, they have a hard time to live, and so we all have. I say that it is not fair to take up one judge and say he is a hard-working man and that we will raise his salary. These things should be fixed by some rule. I know they were all arranged under a law passed two years ago, and that the salary of all the judges was then raised except of those in California.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the gentleman to include the southern district of Illinois.

Mr. POLAND. I am not so well advised in relation to the southern district of Illinois. In relation to the northern district of Illinois we had evidence that the judge of that district, at Chicago, works as hard as Judge Blatchford or Judge Benedict, and he is an able and efficient judge.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Include the western district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. POLAND. I have already.

Mr. BECK. I move to include the district judge of Kentucky, who does more work than any judge named.

Mr. BECK's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CALLIS. I move to include the northern district of Alabama.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. POLAND's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHURCHILL's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I have an additional section to this bill which I know will lead to debate and to a division, and as we have no quorum present I will move the amendment and let it go over until to-morrow.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, or other persons, male and female, now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office and city post office and the bureaus or branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $2,500 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received or that shall be received by them respectively during the past and present fiscal years; and that the necessary amount to pay the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to that as independent legislation altering the salaries; and it has never gone to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. POLAND. This proposition increases nobody's salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the same ground that he overruled that made by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I then move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. FERRISS. I offer as an amendment to the amendment what I send to the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will agree to accept the pending amendment and have a vote taken in the House.

Mr. FERRISS. I object.

Mr. POLAND. Allow something to be said upon it in the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no; we cannot afford to spend the whole time.

Mr. POLAND. How much time will you allow?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will allow you to print anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLAND. I am not a printing man.

Mr. FERRISS. I offer the following as a substitute for the pending amendment:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all such clerks, messengers, watchmen, laborers, and other persons, male and female, as have families dependent upon them for support for which they respectively provide, and who were in their present employment at the close of the last fiscal year, and are now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office and city post office, and the bureaus or branches of the several Departments herein named, and who are paid at a rate not exceeding $2,000 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received, or that shall be received by them respectively during the past and present fiscal year, and that the necessary amount to pay the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to his substitute providing for the clerks and employés of the city post offices at Philadelphia and New York?

Mr. STOVER. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation, and is retroactive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. STOVER. Of its being retroactive?

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as the same point of order has been made two or three times the Clerk will read the rule upon which the decision is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

"But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing the salary, but was framed for that very purpose."

Mr. MYERS. I ask the gentleman from New York to accept an amendment to regulate the pay of employés of the Printing Office.

Mr. FERRISS. This has been gotten up to meet all possible objections that can be made to the proposition, and I therefore do not feel at liberty to accept the amendment. This subject has been before this House a number of times, and while we have increased the salary of the House employés twenty per cent. and have continued it, we have refused to allow any increase to the pay of the clerks in the different Departments. Now, in all the discussion I have heard on this question it has been very generally admitted that there are some clerks and employés who ought to have the additional percentage, but to find out who they are has been a difficult question. It seems to me that the amendment which I propose meets that difficulty as nearly as it is possible to meet it. It proposes to give ten per cent. additional to such employés as have families who are dependent upon them for support.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire now to move that the committee rise to close debate, unless it is closed by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me—

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. POLAND. I object.

Mr. CALLIS. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield to have it read.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. CALLIS, as follows:

That the sum of $2,000 be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury to pay the salary of Rev. Petroleum V. Nashy, postmaster at Confederate Cross Roads.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I insist on the motion that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the special order all debate on the pending proposition shall be closed in one minute after the consideration of the same shall have been resumed.

Mr. POLAND. I hope not.

Mr. HARDING (at eleven o'clock and five minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The question was put; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. I do not myself desire to debate the proposition pending in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but there are one or two gentlemen who desire to say something upon the question, and I hope debate will not be entirely cut off. I hope the gentlemen will allow fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will modify my motion so as to allow five minutes.

Mr. POLAND. I cannot agree to that limitation.

Mr. BUTLER's motion, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question was on the substitute proposed by Mr. FERRISS for the amendment offered by Mr. POLAND.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that I have always voted for this proposition to increase the pay of the clerks in the Treasury and other Departments heretofore, and I should probably have done so again if it had not been for information which has been given to me recently in reference to the clerks in the Departments. One of the chief clerks in the Treasury Department told me night before last that of seventy-five clerks discharged eighteen of them from his bureau were discharged because there was no work for them to do and no place for them to work, and because of general worthlessness besides. The Secretary of the Treasury sent them back; the head of the bureau refused to receive them; and the Secretary then sent them to the Third Auditor, with an order that he should receive them. Now, for that reason, as there is such a superabundance of clerks here, I propose to reduce the force first, and then if there is a necessity to increase the pay we can do it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. POLAND's amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "city post office" the words "the clerks, carriers, and employés, male and female, of the Philadelphia post office."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question was put on Mr. POLAND's amendment; and there were—ayes 27, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. POLAND and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 48.

Several MEMBERS. "Give it up!" and "No further count is insisted on!"

The tellers resumed their seats; and the Chairman announced that the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to offer an amendment. I move to add to the bill what I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. POLAND. Do I understand the Chair to have decided my amendment lost? Is the question settled?

The CHAIRMAN. It is; because the tellers left their places on the announcement that a further count was not insisted on, and the Chair then announced that the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POLAND. The tellers reported the number of votes on both sides, and I supposed that was the end of their duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers were not released, and should not have left their places until so ordered on the announcement of the result by the Chair.

Mr. POLAND. What duty have the tellers to perform except to announce the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Vermont wishes to raise a question of order the Chair will endeavor to decide it; but he will not enter into any controversy with the gentleman. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the sum necessary to pay the compensation of the female clerks, as provided for in the first section of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Mr. PILE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1673) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1870, had come to no resolution thereon.

NICKEL-COPPER COINAGE.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the rules be suspended in order to allow me to report back from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures House bill No. 968, for the coinage of nickel-copper pieces of five cents and under.

Pending the motion to suspend the rules,

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, submitted a report from the committee of conference appointed upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 1576, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

Mr. PILE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: Resolutions of the New York State Agricultural Society, praying that the duty on animals imported for breeding purposes be abolished.

By Mr. BANKS: The memorial of William Rullmann, praying for compensation for losses sustained in consequence of the occupation of his property in Baltimore, Maryland, as a camp by troops of the United States.

By Mr. CORLEY: The petition of Jesse See, a citizen of Lexington county, South Carolina, for a pension for services rendered as a soldier in the war of 1812.

By Mr. ELA: The petition of William A. Parker, for restoration to the active list of the Navy.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A petition of the officers of the Cincinnati Academy of Fine Arts, praying that the authors of fine arts may be protected by copyright.

By Mr. GOSS: The petition of G. Cannon, a citizen of South Carolina, for removal of political disabilities.

Also, the petition of Henry M. Price, a citizen of Virginia, for removal of political disabilities.

Also, the petition of Jacob H. Briggs, a citizen of Virginia, for relief from political disabilities.

By Mr. HUNTER: The memorial of Mrs. Julia A. Nutt, of Mississippi, for legalizing a trading permit.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of William T. Sedwick, guardian of minor child of George F. Sedwick, deceased, late sergeant of company K, sixth regiment United States cavalry, for a special act allowing his pension to commence at the date of his father's death.

Also, the petition of Margaret Pizor, of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, mother of David W. Pizor, deceased, late private in company D, eleventh Pennsylvania reserve corps, for a special act allowing her pension to commence from the date of her son's death.

Also, the petition of A. Dodds and 276 others, citizens of Butler county, Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution as shall recognize Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read in part, when

Mr. BOUTWELL moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

No objection was made.

DUTIES ON COPPER AND COPPER ORES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I submit the following resolution, which is privileged under the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to present to the Secretary of State the act entitled "An act regulating the duties on imported copper and copper ores," together with the certificates of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and Secretary of the Senate, showing that the said act was passed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress after the objections of the President thereto had been received, and after the reconsideration of said act by both Houses in accordance with the Constitution.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday was a motion submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to suspend the rules to enable him to report back from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures House bill No. 968, for the coinage of nickel-copper pieces of five cents and under. Pending that motion the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] submitted a report from the committee of conference on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN.]

MOSES F. SHINN.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands Senate bill No. 467, to confirm an entry of land to Moses F. Shinn.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a private bill, and I think should take its chance with other private bills. I therefore object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POMEROY.]

NATIONAL BANKS—NAMES CHANGED.

Mr. POMEROY. Some time since the House passed a bill (H. R. No. 1282) authorizing certain banks therein to change their names. The Senate has passed a bill precisely of the same character—Senate bill No. 968. I now ask that the Senate bill be taken up and passed.

No objection was made; and the bill (S. No. 968) authorizing certain banks named therein to change their names was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill provides that the name of the "City National Bank of New Orleans" shall be changed to the "Germania National Bank of New Orleans" whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency; provided that such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act.

The second section provides that all the debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the "City National Bank of New Orleans" shall devolve upon and inure to the "Germania National Bank of New Orleans" whenever such change of name is effected.

The third section provides that the name of the "Second National Bank of Plattsburgh" shall be changed to the "Vilas National Bank of Plattsburgh" whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency; provided that such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act.

The fourth section provides that all the debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the "Second National Bank of Plattsburgh" shall devolve upon and inure to the "Vilas National Bank of Plattsburgh" whenever such change of name is effected.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

PUBLIC AFFAIRS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Reconstruction to report from that committee the evidence taken by them upon the condition of affairs in Georgia. It has already been ordered to be printed by the House, and I ask that it be laid on the table.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

NICKEL-COPPER COIN.

Mr. KELLEY. I now resume the floor, and ask that the question be taken on my motion, pending at the adjournment last night, to suspend the rules to allow me to report back from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a bill (H. R. No. 968) for the coinage of nickel copper pieces of five cents and under. The bill contemplates the coinage of one, three, and five-cent coins as substitutes for fourteen representatives of value of the denomination of ten cents and under which are now in circulation.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was read. The first section provides that from and after the 1st day of June next, or sooner if practicable, there shall be coined at the Mint of the United States, and such of its branches as the Director of the Mint, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, the following pieces, to be composed of copper and nickel in the proportion of not less than twenty-five per cent. nor more than thirty-three per cent. of nickel, namely: a piece of one cent to weigh one and one half grams, or twenty-three and fifteen hundredths grains; a piece of three cents to weigh three grams, and a piece of five cents to weigh five grams, with such uniform devices as may be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and such devices, when adopted, are not thereafter to be changed by those officers; and the present coinage of one, two, three, and five cent pieces, whether of bronze, nickel-copper, or silver, and the issue of Treasury notes of ten cents is thereupon to cease.

The second section provides that in adjusting the weight of the coins provided by this act there shall be no greater deviation allowed than three grains for the cent piece and four grains for the other pieces; and the materials for the said coins shall be purchased by the Director of the Mint in like manner as other materials for the use of the Mint are purchased; and in manufacturing the coins and accounting for the same and for materials used the same duties and responsibilities shall devolve upon the respective officers of the Mint as are now required by law.

The third section provides that the same legal penalties as are provided by act of May 16, 1866, in relation to the coinage of five-cent pieces shall be in force for counterfeiting any of the coins provided for by this act or knowingly issuing or passing any such counterfeit coins.

The fourth section enacts that any of the coins provided for by this act shall be a legal tender, except for duties on imports, to the amount of one dollar in any one payment, and no more.

The fifth section provides that the treasurer of the Mint (or branch mint) shall keep and render an account of the profits arising from the coinage provided for by this act; that is to say, the difference between the cost of the metal, the necessary labor and machinery, with the expenses of distribution of the coins, on the one hand, and the amount received for such coins on the other; and these profits shall, from time to time, be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The sixth section enacts that the coins provided for by this act shall be procured and distributed in like manner as is now provided by law in regard to pieces of bronze or nickel-copper.

Mr. KELLEY. I am instructed by the committee to move to amend by adding two new sections providing for the redemption of these and other token coins by the Government. The amendment is to add the following:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it may be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem, under such regulations as he may deem proper, the one and two cent coins heretofore issued with any of the coins authorized to be issued by this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Treasurer and the several Assistant Treasurers of the United States to redeem in national currency, in sums not less than fifty dollars, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the coins herein authorized to be issued, and also the one, two, three, and five cent coins heretofore issued by the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to call the previous question on the bill, and then answer any questions that any gentleman may desire to put to me.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the gentleman calls the previous question I suggest that he modify the language of section eight, which he has just offered as an amendment, by striking out the words "national currency" and inserting "United States notes."

Mr. KELLEY. I am not tenacious in regard to the language of the bill, and I will modify the amendment by making the change the gentleman suggests.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to inquire of my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] whether this bill contains any provision making these small coins a legal tender in the payment of debts?

Mr. KELLEY. They are made a legal tender for sums of one dollar or less in any one payment, except for duties on imports.

Mr. WOODWARD. I had proposed to support the gentleman's bill, for I like this little currency very much; but if these coins are to be made a legal tender I cannot vote for the measure, for I doubt the right of Congress to make anything else than gold and silver a legal tender.

Mr. KELLEY. This bill proposes to make them a legal tender for one dollar or less in any payment for anything except duties on foreign imports.

Mr. WOODWARD. That involves a principle which is objectionable. I do not see much importance in that part of the bill, and I hope the gentleman will agree to strike it out.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot. I am now representing the committee. If the gentleman will hear me for a moment he will see there is no necessity for it.

Under the operation of this bill there will be no silver coin of less than three cents. In looking at the general question of coinage, I may be permitted to say on behalf of the committee that it is probable, when specie payments are resumed, the present quarter of a dollar and ten cent piece may both yield to a twenty cent piece which is decimal with our large coin of twenty dollars. Fractions under ten cents and may be under twenty cents can only be settled by token coinage.

Looking to the constitutional question, our Government has hitherto issued token coins but has refused to redeem them, so that parties might hold by hundreds and thousands of dollars' worth and there was no redemption for them. We have made this coin redeemable by the Government through many of its appointed agents, so as to save as near as may be the conscientious scruples of others, although the members of the committee recognize no constitutional difficulty in the way.

Mr. PILE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I will hear it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And said materials shall be, so far as practicable, of domestic production.

Mr. KELLEY. That amendment was under consideration by the committee, but was not embodied by it in the bill. I personally would not have any objection to it.

Mr. DICKEY. Allow it to be offered.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection to have it submitted to the sense of the House. Nickel, like copper, is found in perhaps one half of the States of the Union.

Mr. DICKEY. Does the gentleman allow it to be offered?

Mr. KELLEY. I do.

Mr. PILE. This nickel is widely diffused in nine or ten States of the Union. Large amounts are produced in several States, especially in my own State. In the southeastern part of Missouri there is a large nickel deposit. One hundred and twenty to one hundred and twenty-five hands are employed. The company working that mine expects largely to extend its operations in the coming summer. All I desire is to give the domestic production the preference under this bill as far as practicable consistent with the interests of the United States. I want preference to be given by the Government to metals produced by our own industry and labor.

Mr. KELLEY. I will now yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. FERRISS. Mr. Speaker, I think the original draft of the bill sent to the committee contained the provision of this amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. We had it under consideration, and the committee came to the conclusion that it was useless, inefficient legislation. I will go as far as the gentleman from Missouri or any other gentleman upon this floor to protect our home industry, to protect the manufactures of our own country. "So far as practicable" is a phrase that we objected to, and struck it out. It will amount practically to nothing at all. That was the opinion of the committee, and for that reason it was stricken out.

Mr. PILE. If the gentleman will suggest a better phrase I will accept it.

Mr. WOOD. This is an important question, and we desire to know what is being discussed.

Mr. PILE. I wish to say in answer to the gentleman from New York I think his objection to the phrase "as far as practicable" is not well taken. The officers of the Mint will understand that in the selection of metal out of which these coins are to be manufactured preference is to be given to that produced in this country if it can be obtained in sufficient quantities. I do not desire to tie up the authorities of the Mint absolutely to the purchase of the home products, because if we do that the producers of nickel might raise the price and thus subject the Government to loss. But if we simply require the Government to give preference where it is practicable to do so we will avoid any such result.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman whether he should not modify his amendment by inserting the words "at equal price." It seems to me the Government should not be at the disadvantage of having the price put up by being obliged to use only the native material.

Mr. PILE. I do not think the amendment would put the Government to that disadvantage, and I should dislike to confine it absolutely to the same price, because the policy of the Government I understand to be that even if it should cost a very little more preference should be given to the native product. We recognize that principle in the whole subject of the tariff. Now, if all should be required to buy the home product at precisely the same price as the foreign product there would be no protection. But if the Government can get the product at approximately the same price, so that the difference is not material, by giving the preference to the home product the Government would stimulate the development of that branch of industry, and in the end would benefit the country.

Mr. KELLEY. I will say to the House that the profit the Government will derive in this matter cannot be less than $10,000,000. From the production of token coins during the last year the resulting profit was $1,800,000, and all the coins were made at the Philadelphia Mint. There is a growing demand for these small coins.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I would inquire of the gentleman, my attention not having been drawn to the reading of all parts of the bill, if there is any limit to the amount of coinage in this bill?

Mr. KELLEY. Hitherto there has been no limit, and such coins have been irredeemable. This bill limits it by making them redeemable by the Government, and providing for their redemption at the Treasury; so that it cannot be the interest of the Government hereafter to emit more than are actually needed. If it does they will come home to rest in its own vaults.

Mr. McCORMICK. It occurs to me that if we adopt the amendment requiring the Government to use no other nickel than that produced in the United States, the result will be that the metal will cost many thousand dollars more than it otherwise would.

Mr. PILE. My amendment does not require absolutely that the Government should purchase the home product. The amendment is:

And the said material shall be, so far as practicable, of domestic production.

Mr. KELLEY. I will now call the previous question; but will first yield to my colleague to offer his amendment.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move to strike out the fourth section, as follows:

That any of the coins provided for by this act shall be a legal tender, except for duties on imports, to the amount of one dollar in any one payment, and no more.

This is a small matter, I agree; but it involves a principle which is important. I do not understand my colleague to object to the amendment on other grounds than that the committee have reported the bill containing the provision. I wish to support the bill because I believe it is a good one, and I will do so very heartily if he will accept this amendment; but if the fourth section is retained I shall be obliged to vote against it, because the Constitution of the United States forbids us to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts. That is my difficulty.

Mr. KELLEY. If the fourth section should be stricken out it would leave the settlement of balances among the masses of the people where petty suits are brought for the purpose of harassment very difficult, because the legal tender for small amounts could not be produced in gold and silver. The act of 1861 made provision to meet that difficulty. I have no objection to this being reduced to an amount of fifty cents or twenty-five cents, but there will be no way of settling differences below ten cents if we do not make these legal tender for small sums. If we should adopt twenty-five cents, the amount of the smallest silver coin, all sums lower than that will be incomputable in any of the currency of the country. It is to meet that exigency, that necessity, that these must be made legal tender for a certain amount. I hope my colleague will modify his amendment so as to say in sums of not more than twenty-five cents, so as to cover the practical difficulty.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. That does not relieve the constitutional difficulty.

Mr. WOODWARD. The principal does not depend upon the amount. It is just as vicious in regard to twenty-five cents as in regard to one dollar. The inconvenience to which the gentleman alludes does not practically exist. There is no practical inconvenience in regard to these small debts. When legal tenders are demanded, something more than a dollar is due and something more than a dollar is demanded. I do not believe the gentleman ever knew an instance of a legal-tender demand of less than a dollar. I am sure I never did.

Mr. KELLEY. I have known them, and I have known a refusal to receive the bulk of a debt in gold because there was a larger amount than the law covered in base coin, it being under a dollar.

Mr. WOODWARD. Did you ever know an instance in which a creditor to whom a dollar or less than a dollar was due demanded that dollar in legal tender?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; I have known persons like Sir Giles Overreach, who wanted to drive out a poor tenant or do something else, take advantage of the least technical point of the law and object because a fraction of the amount offered in payment of a debt was not legal tender.

Mr. WOODWARD. I did not ask the gentleman to go into romance; I asked him about practical facts in actual life.

Mr. KELLEY. Although taking the name of a hero of tragedy I answered that I had seen real personages so act.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. As the difference between gentlemen upon the one side and upon the other seems to be a principle upon the one side and mere convenience on the other, I hope the gentlemen from Pennsylvania will yield and allow this section to be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has allowed the amendment to be offered. The bill being a report from a committee he cannot accept it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the bill proposes a new issue of coin in addition to the currency of the country or if it is merely to supply the place of paper currency to a certain extent?

Mr. KELLEY. It proposes the emission of new coins to absorb the fourteen different representatives of value less than ten cents; merely to take the place of the others and simplify the currency.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is there any limit to the amount?

Mr. KELLEY. I have already stated that there is a practical limitation in making it redeemable, so that if the Government issues an excess it will come home for redemption and rest in its own vaults. I now call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being first upon the amendment offered by Mr. PILE to the amendment reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. PILE. I modify my amendment so as to read:

And in the purchase of the said materials preference shall be given to domestic production if at a cost not exceeding twenty per cent. more than the foreign materials.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—ayes one hundred and two, noes not counted.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was then agreed to—ayes one hundred and seven, noes not counted.

The next question was upon the amendment of Mr. WOODWARD, to strike out the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any of the coins provided for by this act shall be a legal tender, except for duties on imports, to the amount of one dollar in any one payment, and no more.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to upon a division—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD,] desires to be heard on a single point. I therefore yield to him before I call the previous question.

Mr. JUDD. I desire but a moment or two in relation to the constitutional question started by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] That question was discussed in the committee that reported the bill now under consideration, and I propose to state the views of the committee upon it.

The Constitution of the United States provides as follows, among other things, in the powers delegated to Congress:

"To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

Under that provision no reference is made to the material out of which the coinage of the United States shall be made. It is no restriction upon the power of Congress in regard to the material out of which the coins shall be made. Now I will read to the House the provision referred to by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania among the restrictions upon the powers of the States. It is the following:

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

Therefore the objection of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania applies to the prohibition of powers to the States in relation to making and emitting anything else than coin as a tender in the payment of debts. But there is no restriction in the Constitution as to the power of Congress to make coin out of what they see fit.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Will the gentleman point to the provision of the Constitution where the express power is granted to Congress?

Mr. JUDD. I thought I had done so. The language of the Constitution is that Congress may "coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." There is not one word in the Constitution, so far as it relates to the powers of Congress, which indicates whether the coin shall be of gold, silver, copper, or nickel.

Mr. WOODWARD. Allow me to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD,]

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WOODWARD. Instead of offering any argument of my own in reply to my friend from Illinois I will offer an argument which ought to have more weight with him than any argument I could advance. I refer to the argument of Daniel Webster on the Treasury specie circular, in which he demonstrated that the States had no power to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender because of a constitutional inhibition, and that the Federal Government had no power to make anything else than gold and silver a legal tender from defect of power. In the one instance the power was not granted and in the other it was denied. Therefore, if the opinion of Mr. Webster is authority, the argument of the gentleman from Illinois is good for nothing.

Mr. KELLEY. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECORDING A VOTE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended to allow me to record my vote on the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin. I was sick yesterday when the vote was taken.

The rules were suspended; and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I vote "ay."

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CARY obtained leave to have published with the debates remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HOOPEE, of Utah, obtained leave to have printed with the debates remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 1625) to extend the boundaries of the States of Nevada, Minnesota, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming. [See Appendix.]

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CHURCHILL asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers relating to the application of Daniel W. Sims for a pension, heretofore referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LIGHTING THE OLD HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing gas-pipes, with electric gas-burners with lava tips, to be placed over the old Hall of Representatives, to be lighted by electricity from the battery now in use for lighting the Dome, Rotunda, and this Hall, and, if the same shall be deemed expedient, to authorize the work to be done under the direction of the architect of the Capitol extension, and that the expense be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House; Provided, That the same shall not exceed the sum of $1,200.

Mr. ARNELL. I object.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes, as the regular order, the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 7, 13, 14, 22, 32, and 33, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 27, 30, and 31.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: "At the end of said amendment add the following, 'and to continue while acting as minister to Uruguay:'" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And be it further enacted, That the President is, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorized to cause examinations to be made into the accounts of the consular officers of the United States, and into all matters connected with the business of their said offices, and to that end he may appoint such agent or agents as may be necessary for that purpose; and any agent, when so appointed under the seal of the Treasury Department, shall, for the purpose of making said examinations, have authority to administer oaths and take testimony, and shall have access to all the books and papers of all consular officers. And any agent appointed in this behalf shall be paid for his services a just and reasonable compensation, not exceeding five dollars per day for the time necessarily employed, in addition to his actual necessary expenses, the same to be paid out of the sum appropriated for expenses of collecting the revenue, but no greater sum than $5,000 shall be expended as compensation of such agent or agents in any one year. And the President of the United States shall communicate to Congress, at the commencement of every December session, the names of the agents so appointed, and the amount paid to each, together with the reports of such agents.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

Provided, That instead of a minister resident accredited as heretofore, a commissioner shall be sent to the Governments of Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, in Central America, and to the Governments of Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, and Uruguay, in South America, at a salary not exceeding $300 a year each.

And in lines sixteen and seventeen, page 1 of the bill, strike out "$316,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$270,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
WILLIAM H. KELSEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
L. M. MORRILL,
TIMOTHY O. HOVE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman will not insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. If I understand the report of the committee of conference, it proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint agents to administer oaths, to audit accounts, &c., which is new legislation, and was not referred to that committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not introduced in the report of the committee of conference for the first time. If the gentleman will look at the eleventh page of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill No. 1570, he will find that this provision was passed by the House. It went to the Senate and was there struck out. It is now reported in this conference report.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it in the original bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We authorize the President to do what the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to do. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman will not press his demand for the previous question. There is one amendment that ought to be considered. The Committee on Foreign Affairs want to express its opinion of it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I insist on the demand for the previous question, for want of time. I wish we could discuss it.

Mr. BANKS. I hope there will be good nature enough to let us have some consideration of this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have no time for good nature. I should like to debate the question myself. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. BANKS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 70.

So the previous question was not seconded. Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I understand the question just as it is presented to the House in the report of the committee of conference; but I wish to call attention to the fact that the report on the part of the Senate is not signed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of that body. He does not sign it, and one of the conferees on the part of the House does not sign the report. It is not, therefore, a unanimous report.

Now, sir, if it were not that there are material objections to one amendment in the report of the committee of conference I should not trespass upon the time of the House for one moment. It is a question whether the Government of the United States shall be represented as at present in the Central and South American Republics. The amendment approved by the House, and which was struck out by the Senate, reduced the eleven ministers resident in the Central and South American States to three, accrediting those three to certain Central and South American States and making up the representation by other diplomatic officers. The Senate disagreed to that amendment. By the report of the committee of conference it is adopted in another form, which is to reduce the eleven ministers resident at the Central and South American States to four; one to Guatemala, one to Venezuela, one to New Granada, and one to Chili, and commissioners are to be appointed as representatives of the Government of the United States to the other Central and South American States. We object to this because it is legislation on a most important subject, affecting our interests in Europe, Asia, and America in one of the general appropriation bills without an opportunity to consider it fully and carefully in all its extent, in all its bearing by the appropriate committees of the two Houses. We object to it on that ground.

We object to it on another ground. As far as it goes it is partial and unjust. It leaves full representation at places where it is not required, and withdraws it from places where it is required. If there is any one thing the United States ought to do it is to be fully represented at the republican Governments upon this continent. First, because their destiny is our destiny, and again that their interest is our interest. We might well spare a portion of our representatives in Europe, but we ought not to reduce our representatives on this continent, especially our representatives to Central and South American States, either in number or rank.

It may be asked why the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not presented this question to the House. The committee of the Senate more than a year ago, at great expense of time and money, obtained full information on all these subjects, and with careful study and deliberation they have prepared a bill upon this subject. When that shall come here we propose to give it a fair and full consideration. Then is the time for legislation on this subject. It was not becoming or proper for the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House when this question was pending in the Senate, it never having been referred to us in any manner whatever, to anticipate the action of the Senate on the question or to present any other measure on the subject than that which would react upon that body, and for that reason we have been waiting patiently and very properly, I think, for the action of the Senate upon this question, embracing all its considerations.

Now, sir, let me ask the attention of the House to one fact. What does this bill do in regard to Central America? It reduces the number of our ministers in those States to one, who is accredited to Guatemala. I think there ought to be a minister at Guatemala. It is the parent of the Central American States, the first discovered by Columbus, and we could not withdraw a minister from that republic without giving reasonable and just ground of offense to the Government and people of that republic. But there are others just as much requiring representation as Guatemala. Nicaragua is the theater of the operations of the French Government, both for railway and canal across the Isthmus. Honduras also is a country where we have as great interests as we have in Nicaragua. It is a State where England is seeking to establish a canal across the Isthmus. Costa Rica has one or two propositions for a railway at present, and ultimately for a canal. And in

New Granada, which is provided for in this bill, and of which I will speak presently, there is a proposition for a canal on the part of the United States.

Now, here is an isthmus that connects the North and South American continents, which is the most important point of transit between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, the point of transit between the European and Asiatic continents, of which the civilized world is struggling to obtain control and mastery, and where this day Europe is sending its very best men to represent the European interests; and yet the Government of the United States, upon the mere consideration of dollars alone, and that a very unimportant amount, is withdrawing its representation.

Now, sir, I hold that this ought not to be done. It ought not to be done either hereafter or now. If there is any one interest that the United States Government ought to ascertain by its ablest men and with its most constant endeavors, it is to know what is going on in the Central American States in regard to the ultimate solution of this great problem of the Pacific and Atlantic transit.

So much for the Central American States. Now look at the South American States. There are three ministers given to those States—one to New Granada, one to Venezuela, and one to Peru.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. One at Chili.

Mr. BANKS. One at Chili. That was put in instead of Peru.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And one at Brazil and one at Paraguay.

Mr. BANKS. None at Paraguay; that is a commissioner. There are but four.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I beg pardon, there are four of these alterations.

Mr. BANKS. There are but four ministers accredited to the South American States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, you are mistaken; there is one at Venezuela, which is provided for in the bill; one at New Granada, which is not cut off by the bill; one at Chili, and one at the Argentine republic.

Mr. BANKS. I understand not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I beg pardon; look at the bill. There is one at Brazil and one at Paraguay now.

Mr. BANKS. That makes four.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Six, if I understand it.

Mr. BANKS. If the House will attend a moment, I will show that these South American ministers are reduced by this report to four, namely, at New Granada, Venezuela, Chili, and Brazil. There are two ministers at Paraguay and the Argentine Republic, but if this conference report is adopted they will be cut off. That will leave the number of ministers resident of the United States in South America to these four States—Brazil, New Granada, Venezuela, and Chili. Now, sir, if we are to have ministers in these four republics, why do we take away the ministers from the other republics? I want the gentleman who has charge of this bill to answer me that question. Why do we give a minister to Peru and deny one to Chili?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is just the other way. We give one to Chili and deny it to Peru.

Mr. BANKS. Then why give one to Chili and deny one to Peru? What claim has Chili over Peru in this regard? The bill as it passed the House was much better. It accredited ministers to Peru and also to the other republics. But this report of the committee of conference proposes to withdraw even these accredited ministers, and to leave South America, with a population of twenty millions, with ministers at only four of the republics in that part of the world, and send commissioners to the others. Why is it that one republic is entitled to a minister and the others only to commissioners.

Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been our interest heretofore in this part of the world, from this day forth it is to be different and greater. The industry, the products, the commerce, the trade of these Republics are to be increased. They are introducing the new methods of transportation by canals and railways, and the productive wealth of those States is to be vastly greater than it has been heretofore. Up to this time we have had but little share in it. Great Britain and France have taken nearly the whole. The reason of that is apparent. We have been represented in these States in the past history of this country by men who had very little care for the development of the commerce of the country. The representative power has been mainly directed and controlled by the South, and the result of our representation has been that the commerce and productive wealth of these countries has been transferred to Europe, and we have had but a slight share of it.

In the future, with proper representation, this condition of things will be changed. The Government is now in the hands of men who represent those who are devoted and will be hereafter devoted to the interests of productive industry and commerce, and with proper representatives at those Governments their increased products will be largely to the United States instead of being carried, as now, three or four thousand miles across the water to Europe. Their railways, their canals, the roads that they are making into the interior, the improvement of the navigation of their rivers, all tend to the development of their productive wealth, and with proper representation we shall have our share of that trade hereafter. Gentlemen may say that we ought to have had it heretofore. Well, sir, it is perhaps true that we ought to have had it, but the reason we have not had it is very apparent. We have not struggled for it. Europe was first in its representation at these republics. It has always been represented there by its very best men. The Emperor of the French has sent to Chili and Peru within a very short time some of the ablest of the diplomatic representatives of France. England has upon the Pacific coast one of the best lines of steamers ever constructed, and they are thus, and have been for a hundred or two hundred years, maintaining their commercial interests in this part of the world while we have neglected ours altogether. It is not surprising, therefore, that they have maintained that which was theirs entirely at the start, or that we should not have increased ours when we have not given our attention to it. In the future, however, we cannot by any possibility fail of having an increase in trade and commerce between the United States and that part of the American continent.

There is a stronger reason why we should not withdraw our ministers at this time. There has been a contest between the American republics on the Pacific coast and the Government of Spain, which still continues. The United States has offered its mediation, and that mediation has been accepted.

Now, I ask the House upon what theory, or by what show of justice, when we have offered our mediation between these republics and Spain, can we withdraw our representatives and send officers there of the character to which I have referred? The same is true of the republics on the Atlantic side of South America. We have offered our mediation between Brazil and Paraguay, and that mediation has been accepted. Yet, at the very moment when our mediation is accepted, we withdraw our representatives from those republics in a manner which must give offense.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Paraguay and Brazil both have ministers residents now.

Mr. BANKS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And the report of the committee of conference does not propose to withdraw them.

Mr. BANKS. The report of the committee of conference cuts off the minister to Paraguay.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does not.

Mr. BANKS. Let me look at it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, look at it.

Mr. BANKS. If I am wrong I will acknowledge my error to the House. With what show of justice can we now withdraw our representatives there? And what is it proposed to send in the place of our ministers? Commissioners. The amendment proposed by my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] who now has charge of this question, when the bill went to the Senate provided that where a minister was withdrawn from any of those republics the minister to some other republic should be accredited to the republic from which a minister had been withdrawn. There was under that arrangement some show of representation provided for; but there is no such provision in this report. Instead of a minister we are to send a commissioner. Now, in international law there is no such diplomatic officer known as a commissioner.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information. I desire to know whether this report proposes to send a commissioner to each of the Central American and South American States, or only one to the Central American States and one to the South American States?

Mr. BANKS. I understand the intention to be to send a commissioner to each of the States named.

Mr. PAINE. The language of that portion of the report is as follows:

Provided, That instead of a minister resident, accredited as heretofore, a commissioner shall be sent to the Governments of Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, in Central American, and to the Governments of Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, and Uruguay, in South America.

I desire to understand whether it is intended to send two commissioners to all those States or one to each of them?

Mr. BANKS. I understand that the proposition is to send a commissioner to each republic from which a minister resident is withdrawn. Now, what is a commissioner? In the list of diplomatic officers established by the treaties of Europe, and we are bound on this subject by those treaties, there is no such diplomatic officer known as that of commissioner. I could easily obtain a list of those officers, but a commissioner is not among them. Of the many hundred diplomatic officers of the United States in different parts of the world there is not now anywhere a commissioner. I know very well that commissioners have been occasionally appointed by this Government to transact its business with foreign nations from the beginning of the Government. Commissioners have been appointed to negotiate treaties, to arrange the details of treaties negotiated by appropriate diplomatic officers, to run boundary lines, to examine the condition of other countries, to adjust claims of citizens, and to perform a great variety of duties regarded as expedient or necessary by the Government. But they have never been regarded as strictly diplomatic officers. We have had commissioners also who have been charged with diplomatic and other offices and duties.

The United States, by its statutes and by its treaties with foreign nations, has provided sometimes for and appointed commissioners. Such commissioners were appointed to China and Japan, countries that were then regarded as barbarous, unchristian nations, not recognized by the family of Christian nations. And when we provided diplomatic representatives for those countries—China, Japan, and Turkey—it was upon a basis peculiar to itself, and not under any general international diplomatic regulations. For instance, the commissioner to China was a diplomatic officer. He was also a judicial officer. He was also an executive officer. He was also a legislator. He had the powers of these four distinct classes of officers, and was properly called a commissioner. He was not a diplomatic officer protecting all American citizens under the laws of China, or Japan, or Turkey, as he did in other countries. But the commissioner to China, within the limits of five ports of China, executed the laws of the United States, extended our statutes there. If our statute laws were not sufficient, he extended our common law; and when the common law was not sufficient, he was authorized to legislate, in the American sense of the word, for American citizens in the five ports of China, where he was authorized to act. He was therefore an officer representing the United States in what was then considered a barbarous and unchristian country, not recognized by the family of Christian nations; and he exercised powers in these four capacities as a diplomatic officer, a judicial officer, an executive officer, and a legislative officer. In the statute passed upon this subject in, I think, 1848 it was distinctly declared that he was to be held responsible in these several and distinct capacities. Hence he was not in any sense a diplomatic officer exclusively. In the four capacities already mentioned he was to carry out our laws so far as they had been extended to that country by treaties or under statutes of the United States. A commissioner is very properly appointed to discharge duties of this kind; but we have no such case in the Central American or the South American republics. We have established there the ordinary diplomatic intercourse and representation; and if we withdraw our minister resident and send there a commissioner, an officer not known to the diplomatic law of the country, and never charged with diplomatic duties pure and simple, we shall give cause of offense to these republics, and we shall be called upon to make suitable explanations of the reason and policy of our action. If it be deemed best that we shall not continue to send to these republics diplomatic representatives let us withdraw them; but let us not send officers unknown to the diplomatic service or the diplomatic law to these friendly States on this continent who have the same interests to maintain with regard to commerce and government that we have.

Then, sir, look at Paraguay. Every member in the House is familiar with the transactions occurring in that country within the last few months. Our ministers have apparently been driven from the country; their attendants arrested and imprisoned; cut off from all communication with the people of this country. I do not know what may prove to be the exact state of facts in regard to this matter. If they are as reported to us in official communications this country would be justified in terminating all intercourse with Paraguay and declaring war against that Government. What is proposed by the committee of conference? It is that, after withdrawing our minister resident, we shall not terminate all communication with that country, not declare war, but send a commissioner.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is not so.

Mr. BANKS. If it be not so, then I will make amends to the House for misleading it as to the facts. I understand the purpose is to send there a commissioner, an officer unknown to diplomatic regulations, because of the saving to be thereby effected. Now, what is the saving that is to result from this great change in our policy, a change applying alone to the republics on the American continent? What is to be saved by it? Not more than forty thousand out of a hundred or a hundred and forty thousand dollars. By this change, so suddenly sprung upon us, and affecting so greatly the interests of this country in the Central and South American republics, we save $40,000 and no more.

I do not contend that we should continue indefinitely our system of representation as it exists in those republics; but I say that the saving proposed is not sufficient to justify us in withdrawing our representation from these Central and South American republics at this moment, when the whole of Europe is struggling to get control of these keys of the commerce of the world. If such withdrawal should be agreed to by the House upon full consideration of the question, I should have nothing to say; but I desire that when we determine upon such a step we shall consider our relations with Europe and with Asia as well as with the South American and Central American republics.

I understand that the amendment reported by the majority of the conference committee of the two Houses does substantially that which I have stated. I think this amendment must be contrary to the judgment of the House. I hope the report will not be agreed to. Let the subject go to another conference committee, from which it may obtain certainly more time for consideration, and perhaps a wiser and better judgment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I pray, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the House will observe that this debate has been forced upon the House by no motion of mine. It is a matter of considerable importance, and I wish to divest it, in the first place, of some of the bias and prejudice which have been exerted against it outside of this House.

In the first place, the question as it comes to us is, do we need or want representation in Central and South America? Then, if we do need any, how much do we need? The gentleman who has just taken his seat insists that we want every little State in Central and South America to have a minister resident or a minister plenipotentiary. Now, sir, that is the question now before us; and in order that the House may exactly understand it let me state how it is. We have now ministers resident at San Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Costa Rica, in Central America. We have ministers resident there. I will call the attention of the House to a much better authority than mine. I ask the Clerk to read a letter I have received from Mr. Squier, the American traveler and once minister resident in South or Central America. He was there for many years and tells us what is wanted.

The Clerk read as follows:

135 EAST THIRTY-NINTH STREET,
NEW YORK, January 7, 1869.

DEAR SIR: As one who has seen some service in what is called "diplomacy" (a remnant of the fossil period), I am obliged to you for making an earnest effort to abolish a number of useless missions out of which we get much trouble at a round rate of cost. When I went out to Central America under General Taylor I had all the five petty republics on my hands, at a pay of charge, $4,500 a year, and at a time when there was something really to be done there. It was when the British were intriguing to get control of the Isthmus and the Nicaraguan transit; while they were building up their celebrated "Mosquito kingdom," seizing islands, &c. Then one had to travel from one State to another on muleback at great trouble and expense; yet I think the whole business we had in the country was as well done as what we now have there at a cost of $37,500 a year.

I see that you have left Guatemala as an independent mission, for which, it appears to me, there is no good reason. Our interests there are next to nothing, and the trip from Nicaragua can be made in two days in case of need.

I was lately in South America, Peru, Bolivia, &c. The Ecuadorian and Bolivian missions are broad farces. They are kept up only to give patronage to the State Department.

I take the liberty of sending to you a copy of a letter which I addressed some time ago to Senator PATTERSON, and also an article of my own relating to this subject, in which you will find your views substantially indorsed. Should your remarks of yesterday in making the motion you did be printed in full may I ask you to send me a copy?

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. GEORGE SQUIER.

General BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That letter came to me voluntarily. He had seen what I had proposed and what had been the action of the House sanctioning it. I have another voucher. The last minister we had at Bolivia was the present chief justice of the District of Columbia. He was sent out there under Mr. Lincoln, and remained there two years. He felt he could not stay there any longer, to use his own words, receiving a salary which he neither earned nor enjoyed. His last communication to the State Department was in these words:

"It is difficult to state any reason why there should be a minister to this Government."

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the House a bit of history in reference to the creation of this Chilean mission that we are told is of such importance. Let me tell the House how it came to be put in operation, and I speak whereof I know. In 1849, about daylight in the morning on the 4th of March, the House and the Senate sitting until seven o'clock, there was a man from Indiana, Mr. Hannegan, in the Senate who had an unfortunate habit, and as his term was out he had to be taken care of by the outgoing Administration, whereupon a bargain was made that he should be sent in for the Berlin mission, provided the dominant party would give the Chilean mission to the incoming Administration. The appropriation bill of that year I hold in my hand, and you will find by looking at it that that mission was put on. It was created that a position might be given to a certain Senator at the other end of the Capitol. That was the beginning of it, and yet it has continued from that day to this. We have had a minister there ever since at $10,000 per annum.

Now, let us come to the Venezuela mission. We have a minister there, and yet when any business was to be done there we had to send down a man who could talk the language. We had them there at an extra expense and they had nothing to do, and the moment they had something to do a special commissioner had to be sent to make a treaty. And yet we are talking about the great necessity of these men there. We had a minister at Venezuela. Why did not he negotiate the treaty? Why did it require a man to be sent down there who knew enough to speak the language? What is the use of these men? They are isolated, most of them, from the people; they can neither write nor speak the language. They know neither the country nor the language. They have nothing to do except to take their salaries and spend them.

Now, before I pass to the question of Chili and Peru, I want to relieve this question of the argument to prejudice that has been made against it outside of this House. Gentlemen will do me the favor to remember that a year ago I moved in this direction and failed on a point of order. So when I brought it up at this time—of course a man can never find a good motive in the mind of another when he has none in his own—I was immediately assailed on the ground that I made the whole movement in order to get rid of an unfit man as minister at Chili. That would have been a good motive enough, but in order to take away all prejudice I agreed to the suggestion of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate. They said to me this: "Chili has $30,000,000 of commerce, Peru has $16,000,000; so you ought to change it from Chili to Peru. Send your commissioner to Peru and leave the minister at Chili, although he may be the enemy of all mankind." So I yielded to the suggestion because I desired a reduction in the expenses of this Government if it could be done. I yielded to the argument, and I chose to have a minister at the more important post, however he may stand in personal relations to me.

Now, then, I want the House to observe another thing, that this report is signed by all the members of both committees except the two chairmen of the Committees on Foreign Affairs. "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" With them great are the Committees on Foreign Affairs and the chairmen thereof in their own estimation. They say this service ought to be changed. They have been chairmen for six years. Why has it not been changed? They say it wants consideration. Why has it not been considered? They say the service wants revision. Why has it not been revised? And when some of the rest of us attempt to do that which they ought to have done, and which they admit they have left undone, why they come here and say, "Oh, you must not do that; and we will not do it."

But I do not stop there. What have we done? What have the gentlemen on the committee of the Senate and what have the gentlemen on the committee of the House who were not on the Committee of Foreign Affairs agreed to? The House sent the committee this proposition: that there should be but one minister in Central America, that there should be a minister to Peru, one to New Granada, one to Venezuela, one to Brazil, and one to the Argentine Republic, and they should be accredited to the other South American States. But it was said that we might have something for a minister to do in the other South American States; and therefore we agreed, as a compromise, that we would cut off the secretaries of legation, and having cut off the secretaries of legation at $1,500 a year we would send a commissioner to each of these smaller States, where indeed there is nothing to do.

Now, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not examined this bill with his accustomed accuracy. Let me state that the bill now gives a minister to Guatemala, in Central America, and commissioners at $3,000 a year each to the smaller States of Costa Rica, Honduras, and San Salvador. It gives a minister to Venezuela, and if I am not right I ask to be corrected. There is the record, and I know what I am talking about. It gives a minister to New Granada, it gives a minister to Chili, and it gives a minister to Brazil and to Paraguay. Why? Because Brazil and Paraguay are now fighting and we thought it best to have an American minister there to protect our citizens in their rights. We are to have a minister to the Argentine Republic, and to Ecuador, Bolivia, Uruguay, and the smaller States we send commissioners. That is what has been done. We give six full ministers against my will and wish. I think it all wrong. I think the ministers are perfectly useless. But why did I agree to the report? In order to compromise with the gentlemen of the Senate that we may go through the public business, and while I could not save $125,000 to save $75,000.

Now, then, sir, let us see what these States do. I have in my hand the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate, made by Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, and antagonized by the chairman of the committee. Here is a summary of how these States are represented here. Bolivia, Ecuador, and Paraguay have no representatives at all in Washington. Guatemala has half a representative in New York, and San Salvador has the other half of him at New York. Honduras has half a representative, and Nicaragua has half a representative. Costa Rica is only represented by a chargé d'affaires, and the United States of Colombia are only spasmodically represented. Venezuela has no representative resident in Washington. It therefore appears that while we send eleven full legations to these eleven States they only send one full legation to us, to wit: from the Argentine Republic.

These are plain facts which cannot be disputed or denied. Now, what is the argument put forward here by the learned chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs? It is this: that we must have full ministers there in order to prevent the European Powers from stealing those nations. Well, if they would civilize them after they stole them I would not have any great objection to the theft. Some of them are nomadic, half-civilized, with continual civil wars, with continual outrages, and with nothing in common with us. And when the gentleman says that our destiny is their destiny I deny it. We have the destiny of the Anglo-Saxon, the destiny of the people of the north of Europe. They have and must have the destiny of the people of the south of Europe, intermixed and intermingled with the Indian and with every other possible kind of people.

Their destiny is not our destiny. It may be our destiny that we shall have to take care of them; that is one thing. When that time comes I shall be willing to do my share of the work; but I object to putting ourselves on an equality with them by this diplomatic representation.

Now let us go a little further and see what is the ground on which the five ministers resident are to be kept there. It is to protect and enlarge our commerce. Now what do gentlemen suppose is our commerce with Peru to-day? Less than $2,000,000 of imports and exports, all told, backward and forward. What is the extent of the commerce of Great Britain with Peru? About seven million dollars. And what kind of representation has Great Britain in Peru? A chargé d'affaires. What kind of a representative have we there? A full minister.

Now take the country of Chili. What commerce have we with that country, including the commerce of the Pacific coast? About one million six hundred thousand dollars. How much has France with that country? About four million dollars. Who represents us there? A minister resident, a gentleman traveling about this country delivering lectures, a minister plenipotentiary and envoy very extraordinary, I grant you. What representation has France there? A consul general only. So the rule in South America seems to be that the less the trade the bigger the diplomatic representation. What trade has anybody with Ecuador? None at all. What trade has anybody with Bolivia? None at all. What trade have we with Peru? A trade in guano only. Now I should think that guano was a matter that might be looked after by a commissioner. It seems to me to be an article that does not require a full minister resident. [Laughter.]

Now let us go back to Venezuela. A constituent of mine, a ship-master and a sailor, had his schooner on the coast of Venezuela. The people of that Government seized his crew and imprisoned them. He started back with his schooner, but being short-handed it was wrecked in a storm and lost among the West India Islands. My constituent made application to the State Department for reclamation on the Government of Venezuela. What answer do you suppose he received? We had nominally a minister there, and had paid his salary for something like seven years consecutively. The answer last September was that our minister was not there; that we had no such relations with Venezuela that we could make any reclamation.

Now, I ask where was our minister? I see before me a gentleman who knows whereof I affirm, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Pruyn.] On inquiry I was told that the minister had gone away. With whom had he left his business? He had found a very intelligent young gentleman who was traveling there, and turned all the business of the legation over to him, while the minister went off about his own business and pleasure. And I am free to say, and I do say, I trust without prejudice, that young man did the business a great deal better than it would have been done had the minister remained there. This young man carried on the whole business without any salary. And yet we are to hold on to this sort of representation, are we? Why, sir, you can pick up a reliable traveler at any time to whom to intrust this business. We may not always be so successful as was our minister to Venezuela. But we can pick up a traveler at any time and get our business done better than it is done with our resident ministers. In making this statement I affirm that whereof I know. One gentleman in this House knows the exact truth of the statement.

Now, let us go a little further into this matter. It is said that it is our interest to continue these high diplomatic relations with these several States. But, as we see, they do not reciprocate. It is said that our interests in the great highway of the world, the Isthmus, must be protected by seven ministers to seven little States that do not own any part of it. To this my answer is that we have just concluded a treaty which secures us the only practicable route across the Isthmus. It is said that all Europe has been trying to get the control of those States. Well, sir, Spain is not trying; Russia is not; Turkey is not; Greece is not; Austria is not; Prussia is not; Switzerland is not; Sweden is not; Norway is not. What nations then are trying to get the control of those seven States? It may be said England and France are trying. How are they trying? One by being represented by a chargé d'affaires, the other by a consul general only. These nations have no officer of any higher rank in those countries, where we propose to send, instead of a full legation, a commissioner at the pay of $3,000 a year. Let me say again that I do not believe in paying even this much, but I feel obliged to assent to the proposition in order to meet the views of my friends in the Senate.

Now, let me say another thing. The report which was filed in the Senate July 2, 1868, and which I have read, proposes a bill which we have carried out almost precisely so far as we have been able. If gentlemen say to me that our missions in Europe ought to be cut down I heartily assent to the proposition. In cutting them down I will go as far as he who goes furthest. I think that nine out of ten of those missions are about as useful as a fifth wheel to a coach.

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I desire to make a single remark. I have been listening attentively to this discussion, because I desire to get all the information that can be obtained. But, sir, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the utility of sending ministers to these small Governments, I wish to say that according to my understanding our reason for sending ministers to these South American States has been that they have been trying to establish republican institutions like ours, and that we desired to encourage them in this effort; we desired to draw them to us as children of this great Republic of ours. We have not been influenced by any pressing necessity for ministers in those States, or by any great amount of business there; but we have believed it proper to extend over these infant republics a fatherly or, if you please, a maternal care; and we desire to have thoroughly amicable relations with them. This is the idea I have entertained in reference to this question. If there is any other theory I have never known it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is quite right as to the theory upon which we sent these ministers originally. When a Spanish colony had declared itself a republic we sent a minister to it in order to give it full recognition, in order to show our sympathy with it, and in order to protect it against the Government of Spain. But I call the attention of my friend from Illinois to the fact that this reason has passed away. The parent Government, Spain, is to-day weaker than either of these republics. Republican institutions are no longer in any danger on this continent. The smallest one of those States is to-day stronger than the Government of Spain.

Another reason why it is alleged that we should send ministers to those republics is that we may draw them to us. Why, sir, that sounds very well when we consider the recent action of this House. When one of the young republics adjacent to this country, San Domingo, came here and asked us to receive her we would not take her; nor would we agree to take her when she should come in the most formal manner.

All the eloquence of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] could not persuade us to take it, and yet we should have been glad to have had it for one reason, if for no other, that it laid close to us. I do not want Patagonia: I do not know who does. I did want the Dominican republic. She lies at our door; she is a part of this continent; she belongs to the northern and not to the southern continent; she is under our wing. When she comes and asks us to take her I am ready to meet her. Yet we have never had anything but a commissioner there.

Ah, the word "commissioner" troubles my friend. He says that it is not a diplomatic word; he tells us that there is no such thing known to our statutes as "commissioner." Now, let me refer him to the statutes of the country, and a little reading of them will do him a great deal of good. On the 18th of August, 1856, the law was passed which is the foundation of our present diplomatic system. It enacts that "all ambassadors, envoys extraordinary, and ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, commissioners, chargé d'affaires, and secretaries of legation appointed to countries hereinafter named shall receive," &c. Ambassadors and envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary it was provided should receive the full amount specified, and ministers resident and commissioners seventy-five per cent., and chargé d'affaires fifty per cent. of the pay of a full minister. This, then, shows that commissioners are recognized in the statutes as of the same grade among diplomatic officers as ministers resident.

We sent a commissioner to China. But the gentleman tells us that she was not civilized. She was civilized centuries and tens of centuries before South America was known to any portion of the present civilized world. She is to-day far more civilized than the countries which are to-day half Indian and half Sambo or two thirds mestizo.

Does the gentleman mean to say that Hayti is not civilized? Does he mean to say that we send a commissioner to Hayti and not a minister because she is not civilized? That certainly would be a new argument for this side of the House. The color of the inhabitants is by no means darker in Hayti than it is under the equator in Ecuador and Bolivia. Does he mean to say that we send a commissioner to the Sandwich Islands because the Sandwich Islands are only half civilized? No, sir. When we send commissioners we send them where we need the exercise of diplomatic, executive, and judicial powers, and these half civilized nations are precisely the places where I want our representatives to have diplomatic, executive, and judicial powers to protect our citizens. Those powers are centered in a commissioner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see exactly where we stand. We sent to the Senate one proposition of retrenchment and reform. It was a measure of economy. They did not agree to it; they sent it back to us. This House, by a vote of ninety to thirty-two, refused to concur in the action of the Senate. What did we do then? We sent it back to them and asked for a committee of conference. That committee of conference came together and agreed to a compromise proposition on the basis of the Senate bill. That proposition is now before this House in the report which I have just submitted. I may say that the proposition on which we compromised was presented by one of the Senate committee, and we of the House agreed to it after a long and animated discussion.

To this proposition there was no disagreement except on the part of the chairmen of the two Committees on Foreign Affairs, one in the Senate and one in the House. If ever I impute motives, which I never do when I can help it, I should say that the trouble was this: they felt if we should make this reform in the diplomatic service in this way it might possibly be a reflection on them that they had not done it, and therefore they were anxious that we should go on and pay this $135,000 a year. I say $135,000. The salaries are $73,000 and the other expenses are very large, with an exchange sometimes against us of fifteen per cent., all these salaries and expenses having to be paid in gold.

Now, was not this a place where we could save money to the Government? Where shall we begin our much-wanted economy? When we reach the President's salary that was not the place for it. When we reach the clerks' salary we were asked to increase it ten per cent. When we reach these diplomatic expenses we are told, oh, no! we cannot touch them. We are told that American honor demands that we shall go on incurring these useless and extravagant expenditures. No man will let his own specialty be touched. All of us must stand back when we touch the particular thing that is to be economized. When we touch the Indian department the Indian Committee comes in with a protest. When we propose to reduce the expenses of the Army we are told by the Military Committee that they must not be touched. Now we are told that we must not reduce these diplomatic expenses. Great is Diana of the Ephesians. In the meantime taxes are rolling up, in the meantime retrenchment is becoming a by-word, and we are to spend the people's money upon some possible hope—of what? My friend says the hope that we may have some influence down in Ecuador when they put a canal through the Andes or a railroad over them, because that is the only way they can ever extend any canal or railroad into their country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have detained the House so long upon this question. I offered to divide my time, with the pressure of business from every side and with the second appropriation bill stopped in limine. I trust the debate will now be brought to a close.

Mr. CHANLER. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he allow me to ask him if I understood him correctly to make an allusion to the motives which actuated the criticism of gentlemen on this side of the House in reference to striking out the minister at Chili some time ago?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I never said one word about that side of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Because in the course of that debate remarks were made by myself at the time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no sir. I said an argument to prejudice was made outside of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. The motive of the gentleman was right and proper. I do not wish to question his motive. I suppose him to be one of the greatest reformers in this country in some respects. When he took New Orleans he not only took the city but everything in it according to common rumor. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUNGEN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me a few minutes?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield three minutes.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, the same reasons exist for refusing to allow consuls and ministers in other places besides the South American republics; and I cannot see why, when the committee of conference are cutting off ministers there, they do not propose to retrench and reduce the representation at Hayti and Liberia. Certainly the same reasoning that the gentleman uses will apply to those republics. We cannot speak the negro language any more than the Spanish, if that is any reason for cutting off the representation; and as to the matter of commerce we do not care much about that. The gentleman said we did not wish to bring ourselves on a level with these insignificant, mongrel States. And in describing the people the gentleman used some rather curious arithmetic. He said they were one half one thing, three quarters another, and two thirds, I believe, another. That makes more than a whole number. But no matter for that. I desire to offer an amendment to the report putting Hayti and Liberia on the same footing with these other republics.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It cannot be amended.

Mr. MUNGEN. If it cannot be amended then I shall vote against it, because while we are keeping up ministers resident at these black republics, Hayti and Liberia, neither of them have anything more than a chargé d'affaires here.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish the gentleman to understand that I do not reject his amendment. I only say the report cannot now be amended.

The SPEAKER. The report must be agreed to or rejected as a whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield for a short time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I entirely coincide with many of the views stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and perhaps I might go further in some directions than the report of the committee of conference. But I think the committee have made one or two errors in their recommendation. If we have a full minister at Chili we ought to have one at Peru. And while I agree that some of the Central American missions might be abolished, or one person accredited to two Governments, I think when we come to the South American States we will find it difficult to do this. Take the case of the United States of Colombia, and Venezuela, while although they adjoin each other still it takes about as much time to go from Caracas, the chief city of Venezuela, to Bogota, the capital of the United States of Colombia, as it does to go from here to Rome. Whether we should send officers to these Governments called "commissioners" is questionable. It would be better, I think, to invest them with the usual diplomatic title of minister resident or chargé d'affaires and graduate the salaries according to the duties. This, I think, is worthy of more consideration than it can have received at the hands of the committee. The office of "commissioner" does not carry with it quite the powers the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to suppose. No commissioner, indeed no officer accredited from one Government to another, can exercise judicial functions in the country to which he is accredited without the consent of that country. For instance, our ministers in Turkey and China exercise judicial functions, but it is by special arrangement between the two Governments.

Mr. BANKS. The powers attributed to our minister in China are especially conferred by the statute in execution of the treaty made with that country. They are not derived from diplomatic law.

Mr. PRUYN. If these functions are exercised it must be by the consent of the country to which the minister is accredited.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The commissioner to China was appointed before the treaty was made.

Mr. PRUYN. We opened all our negotiations with the East—with the king of Siam, with Muscat, with Japan, and with China—by means of commissioners appointed specially for that purpose. There is no doubt that the term commissioner in our diplomatic relations has become a title well known to us, but it is not well known to the other nations.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me say to the gentleman that the title of commissioner was agreed upon after great consideration by the committee of conference as being the best as between that and chargé d'affaires.

Mr. BANKS. It was objected to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, by you.

Mr. PRUYN. In looking into Wheaton to find the definition of commissioner, and his description of the powers and duties of commissioners, I do not find that they are so broad as the gentleman from Massachusetts has, no doubt inadvertently, stated them to be.

In regard to one of the missions to South America, to which allusion has been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER]—and but for that allusion I certainly should not have referred to it—I can say, not only from my own knowledge of the circumstances, but from information from the State Department, that the duties of that mission, although they happen to have been very burdensome and unusually intricate and perplexing during the last year, in consequence of a revolution which has taken place in that country, have been discharged to the entire satisfaction of the State Department by a person closely related to me, whose rank has been only that of chargé for the time being, and whose compensation has barely sufficed to pay the actual office expenses of the legation. I have no doubt that the duties of that post could be satisfactorily discharged by a person of the rank of a chargé, and consequently at a less expense to the Government than a minister resident, and this is probably the case with reference to several of the Central and South American Governments. I think that further consideration should be given to this matter, and prefer that the report should be disagreed to, that we may have a new committee of conference and see if some other result cannot be reached.

The brief time I have prevents me from presenting other considerations bearing upon this matter, and I must leave it at this point.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. To what extent does the reform go that is proposed by the report of the committee of conference? To what extent has the number of representatives to these little republics been cut down; and how much are the expenditures of this Government diminished thereby?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will answer the gentleman. There is no place to which either a minister or a commissioner is not sent; so that the number of representatives is not cut down. But the expense is reduced $100,000 in gold.

Mr. PRUYN. Let me say one word right here. I do not know that particular allusion has been made in this debate to our promulgation of the Monroe doctrine, which imposes duties upon us in relation to the Central American and South American States which might not otherwise have existed. We do not mean that other nations shall interfere there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In answer to that, I wish to say that when the Monroe doctrine was promulgated the first movement was the establishment of the Panama mission.

I now want to call the attention of the House to the fact that commissioners are well known and well understood diplomatic officers, and are made a part of our consular system. I do not desire to continue this debate longer. I desire merely to call attention to two or three other points in the report of the committee of conference. One point is that the report provides that the President may send out agents to oversee diplomatic officers where it is charged that they are not behaving well. We never have had that power before. That is a measure of great necessity and of great economy, one that was the cause of a great deal of discussion. The other points are minor ones. The only one to which I wish now to call attention is where we have struck out an amendment of the Senate that if adopted would have taken about $40,000 more out of the Treasury. It is now agreed that that shall be stricken out. I hope the report of the committee of conference will be concurred in. We have so much business yet to do that this subject cannot well be debated further. And if we have another committee of conference there will probably be another debate on their report, which may peril the passage of the bill. I propose now to call the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I desire a few minutes to make a statement to the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To which it may be necessary for me to reply.

Mr. BANKS. It makes no difference to me whether the gentleman replies or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. BANKS. I do not demand any of the gentleman's time. I want to speak in my own time; I want ten or fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the gentleman that having spoken once on this question he cannot, under the rules, be again recognized as entitled to the floor if any other gentleman desires it.

Mr. BANKS. I will not take the floor if any other member desires to speak now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield the remainder of my time, but a minute or two, to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKS. Very well; I will go on with what I have to say; I dissented from the report of the committee of conference, understanding it to be somewhat different from what it is. It provides for five ministers resident, and for sending commissioners to seven States. I did not sign and therefore did not read the report when it was submitted to me, but I understood the proposition when it was finally adopted in the conference of the two Houses to provide for four ministers resident and eight commissioners. It now stands five ministers and seven commissioners. Commissioners are to be sent to Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, and our ministers withdrawn—the very States where we are now contending for the transit, while a minister resident is to be retained at Guatemala, further north and above all these States. And in South America, commissioners are to be sent to Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, and Uruguay, at a salary of $3,000 instead of ministers resident at $7,500. The difference between these salaries of $7,500 for ministers and $3,000 for commissioners is all the economy in that respect provided for in this bill. It does not amount to $40,000.

My colleague has said that probably the Committees on Foreign Affairs, or at least the chairmen of the committees of the Senate and House, might have been somewhat sensitive because we had not considered this subject as we ought to have done, and might regard it as a constructive censure if any measures of this character were approved by the two Houses. Let me say that I have no fears of that kind. The House of Representatives has never in any manner referred this subject to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It has on the contrary specifically referred its consideration to another committee of the House. The Senate has referred it to a special committee of that body, and not to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Thus, by specific orders of the Senate and the House, this subject was removed from the two Committees on Foreign Affairs and assigned to other committees. Hence it would not have been proper or right for the Committee on Foreign Affairs to act upon this question.

Now, I ask my colleague what propriety there is in the Committee on Appropriations taking cognizance of this subject which has never been referred to that committee, and which by the rules of the House it is forbidden to consider, and presenting in its report what, as appears from the statement of my colleague, appears to have been the result of the labors of other committees of the Senate and the House. My friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] is a member of the committees by whom this subject has been considered, and I should be glad if he would give the House his views on this question, though I do not know what they are.

One word in reply to what has been said of the rank of diplomatic representatives. When we send ministers to the South American and Central American republics we send them under the general diplomatic regulations as understood and accepted by the civilized nations of the world. Our statutes, where they touch upon this subject, only repeat the general regulations adopted by all nations. The practice on this subject, so far as Europe is concerned, is found in the regulations established with regard to the rank of diplomatic agents by the Congress of Vienna, in 1815. It was there declared that—

"Those of chargés d'affaires accredited near to the ministers charged with foreign affairs. The ambassadors, legates, and nuncios alone have the representative character."

When we send diplomatic officers to the South American or the Central American republics, we send them under this law, recognized by all civilized nations as governing diplomatic intercourse; and when we withdraw from these eight republics our ministers resident and send to them commissioners, officers not recognized by the established and accepted diplomatic regulations, having a character quite different from ambassadors or other diplomatic representatives, we cannot deny that under the present circumstances at least we do that which will require explanation, and which may possibly give just cause of offense to our sister republics. I know that by the statute of 1856, to which I referred in my first remarks, we provided for the representation of this country in China and Japan by commissioners. But such officers had a distinctive character which took them out of the category of purely diplomatic representatives; and wherever we have provided for such officers we have assigned the reasons for such a course. In this case we can assign no reason which would justify the change proposed.

In regard to the general subject of our diplomatic representatives in foreign States, I say to the House that when it shall come before us I will consider it without prejudice either in regard to the Central and South American republics or to the States of Europe and Asia. But I deny the right of the Committee on Appropriations, without having this subject referred to them at all, to appropriate to themselves the labors of other committees which have had the subject under consideration by the direct order of the House. In view of this special reference of the subject the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs are relieved from any censure whatever; they have not considered it proper for them to take the subject under consideration.

I have said that the sole retrenchment proposed in the report of the committee of conference is in the substitution of seven commissioners for seven ministers resident, the difference being $4,500 in the salary of each officer, and that economy is not the only object which the House should have in view. One object at least should be to send to the republics on this continent at least representatives of such rank as to give them precedence over the representatives of European Governments. It is therefore of no consequence that some of the great Powers of Europe send there a chargé or a consul general. We desire in those countries an officer who shall take precedence of the representatives of other nations. When all Europe is struggling for the control of the isthmus lying between the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans it is wise for us to withdraw our ministers from each of the States where the transit, if it be at all possible, must be effected? Attention has been called to the fact that Great Britain and France alone have obtained charters. Now, let me say to the House that every European nation has a deep interest in controlling this transit, distinct from and adverse to the interests of the American republics.

China, when our statutes authorized diplomatic intercourse with her, was regarded as outside of European civilization. So was Japan. Both of these nations have come forward and asked to be recognized. They claim now the privileges of and assume the responsibilities imposed by international law. We have responded to their invitation; we have negotiated treaties and accredited to them diplomatic representatives, and now we are asked substantially to assume the rejected note of China, and withdraw our diplomatic representatives not from Europe, but from the republics of this continent with whom we ought to maintain the closest intimacy, and where our representatives are imperatively demanded by all our interests and every consideration of public honor. Such a result, if unhappily it shall be reached, cau-not be in accord with the judgment of the House or the interests of the country.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only desire to say that we have a minister to China because we have a great trade with that country, which is constantly increasing, and which ought to be protected, while we have no trade worth speaking of with these Central and South American republics. I am not afraid of England and France taking anything away from us. They will do very well if they can keep what they have got without seeking to get anything more North or South. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BANKS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 93, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Deweese, Driggs, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Grover, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, McCarthy, McCormick, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Newsham, Niblack, Norris, Pike, Plants, Poland, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Wood, and Woodward—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Cook, Culum, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stewart, Stover, Taber, Taffe, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Young—93.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barnum, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Buckland, Cake, Callis, Delano, Dockery, Eckley, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Halsey, Asahel W. Hubbard, Julian, Lincoln, Maynard, Morrissey, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Pierce, Pile, Polesley, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—41.

So the report of the committee was rejected.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, and move that the House insist on its non-concurrence and ask for another conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I will say to the Speaker that I do not wish to be on that committee of conference. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. CAKE for two days.

MRS. MITCHELL.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mrs. Mitchell.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MILLER was granted leave to print a speech on the aspect of the country. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 72) for the relief of John M. Broome and others, the band of the twelfth Kentucky infantry;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 119) authorizing the Secretary of War to take charge of the Gettysburg and Antietam national cemeteries;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 211) for setting apart a portion of the Fort Snelling military reservation for a permanent military post and the settlement of all claims in relation thereto;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 230) authorizing the erection of brick buildings for military purposes at Fort Totten, in Dakota Territory;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 201) to drop from the rolls of the Army officers absent without leave;

An act (S. No. 877) to remove the charge of desertion from certain soldiers of the second North Carolina mounted infantry;

An act (S. No. 959) to repeal the second section of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867;

An act (S. No. 830) for the relief of Orlando Brown; and

An act (S. No. 960) relating to freedmen's hospitals.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following bills of the House:

An act (H. R. No. 424) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men;"

An act (H. R. No. 1280) for the relief of Lieutenant Leonidas Smith, late of the twenty-second regiment Indiana volunteer infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 1868) for the relief of H. A. White;

An act (H. R. No. 1878) for the relief of George W. Short;

An act (H. R. No. 273) to amend the act of April 10, 1806, for establishing rules and articles of government of the armies of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 1489) granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society;

An act (H. R. No. 1823) for the relief of Walter D. Plowden; and

An act (H. R. No. 1872) providing for the payment of Captain Goldman Bryson's mounted company.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following bills of the House, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1279) in relation to additional boundaries, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army.

SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to make the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (S. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their amendments and agree to the resolution of the Senate, with an amendment, as follows:

In section one, line two, strike out the words "or hold office;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,

JOHN A. BINGHAM,

JOHN A. LOGAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM M. STEWART,

ROSCOE CONKLING,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WOODWARD. I rise to a question of order. I had the honor of presenting a question of order the other day in regard to a committee of conference on this subject and it was overruled, upon the ground, as I understand and as it was reported I believe in the Globe, that legislation in regard to a constitutional amendment was legislation under the ordinary rules of this body, and that a committee of conference was as suitable to that kind of legislation as to ordinary legislation. My point was that this was extraordinary legislation, resulting merely in an expression of concurrence on the part of the two Houses, and did not come under the ordinary rules of legislation at all, and therefore could not go to a committee of conference. But I was overruled on that point. Now I make another point of order resulting from the position taken by the Speaker on that occasion. I hold that this report of the committee of conference must go to the President of the United States for his approval; and in support of the point I refer the Chair to that clause of the Constitution which declares that—

"Every order, resolution, or vote in which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

The Chair will observe that this constitutional provision makes the only exception from ordinary legislation in cases of adjournment. The Chair has already ruled that legislation in regard to a constitutional amendment is ordinary legislation. It is either an order, a resolution, or a vote; and if it be an order, a resolution, or a vote, then it must go to the President for his concurrence.

Mr. CULLOM. I would inquire whether the gentleman is making a point of order or a speech?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is making a point of order; it is an important one and the Chair desires to hear it.

Mr. CULLOM. It is a very long one.

Mr. WOODWARD. The gentleman seems to be very impatient, but I hope the Chair will allow me to state it fully.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having stated the point of order the Chair will decide it. It has been raised once before and decided by the Chair. He will repeat the substantial points of that decision, which he thinks will satisfy the gentleman that his point is not well taken, although based by him upon the Constitution of the United States. The question was raised distinctly in 1803 in the Senate of the United States on a motion that the then proposed amendment to the Constitution should be submitted to the President:

"On motion that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to present to the President of the United States for his approbation the resolution which has been passed by both Houses of Congress proposing to the consideration of the State Legislatures an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the mode of electing President and Vice President thereof, it was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23."

On a distinct vote of 23 to 7 the Senate voted that the Committee on Enrolled Bills should not present the proposed amendment. This is a decision made by one of the early Congresses. But the Chair is not satisfied with having it rest on that; he is disposed to present higher authority in overruling the point of order.

In 1798 a case arose in the Supreme Court of the United States depending upon the amendment to the Constitution proposed in 1794, and the counsel, in argument before the court, insisted that the amendment was not valid, not having been approved by the President of the United States. The Attorney General, Mr. Lee, in reply to this argument, said:

"Has not the same course been pursued relative to all other amendments that have been adopted? And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of investing the President with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of Congress."

That was the remark of the Attorney General. But the Chair does not rest his decision upon that. He sustains it by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The court, speaking through Chase, Justice, in reply to the Attorney General, observed:

"There can surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation. He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution."

As the Supreme Court of the United States has settled this question by a decision, the Chair does not need to read further authorities. But this question came before the Senate of the United States recently, since the recent exciting questions have been before the country, and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate [Mr. TRUMBULL] offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States respecting the extinction of slavery therein having been inadvertently presented to the President for his approval, it is hereby declared that such approval was unnecessary to give effect to the action of Congress in proposing said amendment, inconsistent with former practice in reference to all amendments to the Constitution heretofore adopted, and being inadvertently done, should not constitute a precedent for the future; and the Secretary is hereby instructed not to communicate the notice of the approval of said proposed amendment by the President to the House of Representatives."

Upon that resolution the Senator from Maryland, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, who had been formerly Attorney General of the United States, made a speech which the Chair will not quote, corroborating, however, the opinion of the Chair, and the Senate adopted the resolution of Mr. TRUMBULL without a division and without the yeas and nays.

The Chair, therefore, thinks that the question is settled, not only by the practice of Congress, but by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I propose to let the House understand what this report of the committee of conference is. It is the original proposition of the Senate with the words "and hold office" stricken out; so that if the report be agreed to the proposed amendment will read:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I am happy to be able to say, as the report shows, that it is unanimous so far as the managers on the part of the House are concerned, and I presume that the House is ready to vote upon the report of the committee. I demand the previous question unless some gentleman desires to debate the report, which I hope will not be the case at this late hour of the session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it requires a two-thirds vote to agree to the report.

Mr. POLAND. I ask that the Clerk may read the proposed constitutional amendment as it will stand if this report is adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK. Do I understand the Chair to say that it requires a two-thirds vote to agree to the report?

The SPEAKER. It is the opinion of the Chair that every part of the proceeding must be covered by a two-thirds vote in both branches.

Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. NIBLACK called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 44, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Bently, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W.

Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cliff, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dickey, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Elliott, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketchum, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, William Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Seafield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taft, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Unson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and the Speaker—144.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glessbrenner, Golladay, Gruber, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Longbridge, Mallory, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Stone, Taber, Van Auken, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—44.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Barnum, Blackburn, Boles, Buckland, Calk, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Edwards, Halsey, Asahel W. Hubbard, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Pierce, Pile, Polsley, Randall, Schenck, Selye, Sitgreaves, Sypher, Taylor, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—35.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, which in the opinion of the Chair requires a two-thirds vote. Upon this question the yeas are 145, nays 44. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the report is agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 273) to amend the act of April 10, 1806, establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 424) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men;"

An act (H. R. No. 1280) for the relief of Lieutenant Leonidas Smith, late of the twenty-second Indiana volunteer infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 1323) for the relief of Walter D. Plowden;

An act (H. R. No. 1489) granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society;

An act (H. R. No. 1868) for the relief of H. A. White;

An act (H. R. No. 1872) providing for the payment of Captain Goldman Bryson's mounted company; and

An act (H. R. No. 1878) for the relief of George W. Short.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire now to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills.

Mr. LAFLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly. Mr. LAFLIN. I ask the special attention of every member of this House to the statement I am about to make. If the House desires that the debates of Congress shall continue to be reported and printed immediate action should be taken looking to that end. I therefore ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to forego the consideration of the appropriation bills for a time, in order to give me an opportunity to call up the joint resolution on this subject adopted by the Senate yesterday. If the House shall take upon itself the responsibility of delaying action on that resolution then the Committee on Printing cannot be held responsible. I hope that the House will not go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills, but will at once proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution of the Senate in reference to the debates of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me make a single statement in regard to the business of the House. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is one, as is well known to members, of some fifty printed pages. After it shall have passed the House it will take a long time to engross it. It must then go to the Senate, there to be considered by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, then passed by the Senate and returned to this House for action on such amendments as the Senate may make to it. Now, if we do not get the bill through the House to-day—instead of taking up this subject of reporting and publishing the debates, which will probably give rise to considerable discussion, as it did in the Senate—it will be almost impossible to pass the appropriation bills at all this session. I will therefore move that the rules be suspended and the Committee of the Whole discharged from the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the purpose of considering the same in the House at this time. There is still pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] And I propose also to allow the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to offer an amendment, after the bill is in the House, in relation to the compensation of employés.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would also remind the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that the Delegate from Colorado [Mr. CHILCOTT] desires to have a vote on his amendment relating to the branch mint at Denver City.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly; unanimous consent was given in the Committee of the Whole that a vote should be taken on that amendment in the House.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and, two thirds voting in the affirmative, it was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Accordingly the rules were suspended; and the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now before the House for consideration with the amendments made thereto in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to offer his amendment.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the bill by adding thereto what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, laborers, and other persons, male and female, now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, Treasury, Navy, War, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office, the city post office, and the bureaus and branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $1,800 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received by them, respectively during the past and present fiscal years; and that the necessary amount to pay the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. POLAND. A very extraordinary statement was made in Committee of the Whole last evening on this subject. I desire to have read a short letter from the Treasury Department bearing on it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That would be in the nature of debate.

Mr. POLAND. It is in answer to a statement made here last night.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot consent to any debate before the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] which the House authorized to be offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the sum necessary to pay the compensation of the female clerks, as provided for in the first section of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. This exhausts the authority granted by the House as to the offering of amendments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that he may offer an amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] by inserting after the words "city post office" the following:

The clerks, carriers, and employés, male and female, in the Philadelphia post office.

The SPEAKER. This amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. MCCULLOUGH. I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order without unanimous consent. An amendment to an amendment is already pending.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to have a separate vote upon the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole restricting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose that each amendment shall be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read in their order, and those upon which a vote is not demanded will be considered as adopted.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to speak on the bill he must speak before the House begins to vote on the amendments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose, if there be no objection, that the hour allowed me for debate shall be consumed in the discussion of the amendments as we progress in voting upon them.

The SPEAKER. The rules require that the hour to which the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled after the seconding the previous question shall be occupied before the vote is taken on the amendments. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may be entitled to an hour for the discussion of amendments as the vote upon them proceeds. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPKINS. I object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing me my hour in the manner I have stated.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and it was ordered accordingly.

The amendments were read and were adopted in gross, except those upon which a separate vote was demanded.

The Clerk read the following amendment of the Committee of the Whole:

Strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no judgment of said court for any sum exceeding $5,000 shall be paid unless the same shall be confirmed by Congress.

And in lieu thereof insert the following: Provided, That no judgment of said court for any sum exceeding $5,000 shall be paid out of this appropriation unless the same shall be confirmed by Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, this amendment in terms proposes merely that out of this appropriation no judgment of the Court of Claims exceeding $5,000 shall be paid. It does not purport on its face to prohibit the court from rendering a judgment for a larger sum than $5,000; but practically and really it is cutting down the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to $5,000. Whoever gets a larger judgment, instead of being entitled to be paid at once out of the Treasury has to come to Congress for a confirmation of his claim just as if it had never been adjudicated.

Now, sir, if this plan is to prevail, if this doctrine is to be established in relation to the Court of Claims, we had better repeal the law constituting that court and abolish it at once. I do not understand this constant carking at the Court of Claims. I have never heard a suggestion from any quarter that the judges of the Court of Claims were not as upright judges, were not as industrious judges, were not as learned judges, and were not as competent to decide the questions which came before them as any other tribunal in this land. In my judgment it is of the highest importance and of the highest interest to this Government that the Court of Claims should be sustained; and instead of narrowing its jurisdiction, I say that its jurisdiction should be enlarged. It is a matter of great importance to the Government that the claims which may be held and urged against it should undergo a careful, impartial judicial investigation. We all understand what sort of investigation claims receive that are brought before Congress. Ordinarily before committees they are considered and decided on ex parte testimony, instead of having witnesses on both sides brought together and confronted. Claims which come before the committees, I repeat, are examined on mere ex parte evidence, a great portion of which is not under oath at all. Indeed, a great portion of it is such as we get from interested persons at the corners of the streets.

I say that it is not only the interest of the Government but the interest of honest claimants which will be greatly promoted by having these cases subjected to a judicial investigation. And as I have said before I know no charge against the court. I have never heard a suggestion of want of integrity in regard to that court. On the contrary, I believe that in every single respect the greatest confidence is reposed in their integrity. It is, of course, scarcely possible that in the multitude of cases which have come before them they should not at some time have made some wrong decisions; but I have never heard but what their judgments stand as firmly as the decisions of any other tribunals in this country. Why, then, this attempt to black-ball and fly-blow the Court of Claims in this way?

I can understand that it is our duty to provide some tribunal where honest people can go to have their honest rights adjudicated. We should not subject small claimants to the vexations and delays incident to an examination before Congress. These small and honest claimants we should look after and protect, for the large claimants who can pay for a heavy lobby influence can get their cases through Congress, while the small claimants who have no money to spend will not find it so easy. These claims against the Government should be subjected to a judicial examination by an honest and learned court. It is due to the Government and it is due to the claimants against the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I should like, if I could get the attention of the House, to state the views which are held by the Committee on Appropriations on this subject. The gentleman from Vermont has discussed the character of the Court of Claims. I do not propose to do so unless it be to indorse it. The chief justice of that court is from my own State, and I know him well. He is an able judge and an honest man. The Committee on Appropriations make no charge against the court and give no currency to any scandal which may have originated anywhere else against it.

Under the Constitution of the United States the President and Senate can make treaties by which millions of money may be expended. Who ever heard before of a bill being presented to Congress to cover all the treaties which the President and Senate might make in the future? For half of the treaties that are made they bring in a bill to pay the expenses. We have, under the law of nations and also by solemn treaty with foreign Powers, agreed that we will save all the judgments of our own courts in favor of foreigners where vessels have been wrongly seized by our Navy; damages of that kind go into our prize courts; but never did you hear of a bill being brought in in advance to pay all the judgments that might be rendered in the future. Whenever a judgment is rendered it is taken to the Secretary of State by the party interested, and then through him or the President a communication is sent to Congress, and we make the necessary appropriation.

Now, we have a Court of Claims which has to hear and pass upon certain cases. When it has decided and given a judgment in favor of a certain claim we say that under the Constitution an appropriation must be made to pay it. We do it just exactly as we make appropriations to meet the judgments of other courts and the action of the treaty-making power of the country. But in this thing the claimants are to be such a favored class and this court is supposed to be so preëminent above all other United States courts that we must make an appropriation in advance, not to pay any claim that is now pending, but any claim that can be fished up and a judgment rendered thereon. We have made an exception already according to the bill of the Committee on Appropriations of judgments of $5,000. Where a claimant comes in and gets only that amount we allow this court to put its hand into the Treasury of the United States and pay it without Congress knowing anything at all about it or without rendering any account. But all larger judgments must come to Congress, the same as in the case of a judgment of a prize court or the same as in the case of a treaty, and an appropriation must be asked for. As matter of course, as a general thing the appropriation will be made. The claim seldom goes through an investigation by a Committee of Claims, and there is no further examination of it than is made by the Committee on Appropriations. But if there is reason to suspect anything wrong, I suppose there would be some investigation here.

No honest man ought to ask that you shall open the Treasury door that he may thrust his hands in slyly, unbeknown to the public, and take out the funds to meet a judgment. The only thing I know against this Court of Claims is that they ask us to anticipate what they may do, to indorse their action in advance, to appropriate money and put it at their disposition, so that they can pay over their judgments. A pure court ought only to decide upon a claim and be entirely indifferent whether it is ever paid or not.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say that I do not speak in behalf of the court. I have never had a word of conference with any member of it on this subject.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I did not say that the gentleman did.

Mr. POLAND. The objection was that they asked this or that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. When the gentleman went on to tell us what a great court it was I concurred with him. I only say I want to treat them as we do all other courts.

Mr. POLAND. It is in the interest of the Government that I am speaking, not of the court.

Mr. SCOFIELD. We have now pending bills to appropriate money to pay the judgments of this court and members of Congress in favor of claims. Who ever thought of making appropriations for that court in advance? I say let them all stand alike. When judgments above $5,000 are rendered in favor of claimants, let them come in here and ask for appropriations to meet their judgments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. PILE. If the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is worth anything at all it is against making any appropriation. If it amounts to anything it goes to show that the whole bill is wrong, that the whole previous action of Congress in regard to this Court of Claims is wrong, and that no appropriation should be made except upon a judgment rendered. Now, if you appropriate anything at all is there any reason why you should appropriate money to pay a judgment for $5,000 and withhold the payment of a judgment for $5,200?

I object to this amendment, secondly, because all the judgments heretofore rendered, if I am correctly informed, in the Court of Claims will amount to $100,000; I mean all the judgments of less than $5,000 each. It is to be restricted to that amount. There is an unexpended balance now in the Treasury to the credit of the Court of Claims sufficient to more than pay all the judgments that will be rendered in the next two or three years, taking the past as a precedent. I object to the amendment also because the effect of it is, in all cases where the claim amounts to more than $5,000, no appeal from the judgment of the court can be had to the Supreme Court either by the Government or by the claimant, because it takes the case from the Court of Claims to Congress, and the Supreme Court cannot and will not entertain the case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield two minutes to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not suppose that any person wishes to impugn the ability or the integrity of the Court of Claims, but I do hold that power is fast stealing away from the Representatives of the people. Under the Constitution and under the laws as they were first enacted under the Constitution all these claims were obliged to be passed upon by the Congress of the United States. Now Congress has given power to this Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of claims unlimited in amount. They can take jurisdiction of a claim against the Government of the United States to the extent of $1,000,000 as well as of one of ten dollars. Are we prepared to say that Congress will no longer hold any supervision over any claim against the Government, no matter what may be the amount? The committee only mean by this proviso to say that this appropriation of $100,000 shall be expended in small amounts. The Court of Claims may have their judgments satisfied out of it to the extent of $5,000 each judgment. That is the idea.

Now, if there be judgments for a greater amount, for $20,000 or $50,000 or $100,000, let those judgments pass under the supervision of Congress. Has the Court of Claims any right to complain of this? Has any friend of the court any right to complain? If the sum is not large enough, why raise it from $5,000 to $10,000, but let us hold, in the name of the people, some check upon this tribunal, no matter how pure it may be as at present constituted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MUNGEN.]

Mr. MUNGEN. I am opposed to the amendment and the whole proviso bringing cases from the Court of Claims to Congress. The proposition to limit the judgment of the Court of Claims is wrong, because—

1. Claimants have been induced by the laws of Congress to present their demands against the Government to that court for adjudication without regard to the amount.

2. If this limitation is made claimants had much better go directly to Congress, especially those who have doubtful claims, where they can present their cases ex parte before the committees, where the rules of evidence are not enforced and witnesses are not likely to be cross-examined. Claims that are obviously bad and such as are not founded on contracts are not presented to the Court of Claims. All such seek some other avenue through which to reach the Treasury. They cannot bear the investigations of a court which rigidly enforces the rules of evidence.

3. Such an enactment would in effect prevent appeals from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, as the judgment or decision in such a case would not be final, but would depend upon the future action of Congress. As well might you limit the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to claims not exceeding $5,000, or organize the Senate and House of Representatives into a grand court of claims from whose decision there can be no appeal. If the latter, the bondholders and bankers would be all right, but God help the poorer and more honest claimants.

4. It would be unjust to those claimants who have been induced to prepare their cases for the court when less exactness in the testimony would have been sufficient for committees.

5. If the Government is to be sued at all it should go into the courts on equal terms with other suitors and the judgments of the court should be binding on all alike. There is no good reason why a claim of $3,000 for hire of a steamboat, for instance, should be paid any more readily than a claim for $8,000 for the hire of the same steamboat. The principle involved in the limitation proposed is wrong, and in my opinion tends to work injustice and great inequality—tends to retard and hinder the ends and objects of justice rather than to advance and promote the same.

Instead of limiting the powers of the court it would be infinitely better to extend them. Their examinations and investigations are open and fair. The testimony in the court is all printed and open to inspection. The Government is there represented by able and vigilant attorneys; and there is but little probability of the Government being defrauded through that channel—certainly not half so much as where the investigations are carried on in comparative privacy and on ex parte statements and testimony. Sometimes obscure clerks in the different Departments dispose of hundreds of thousands of dollars every year with no established rules to govern them; and they doubtless often reject or allow claims and accounts without regard to the evidence, but merely on their own whim or caprice. It is in their power often to allow claims as a matter of favor or reject them from spite. Their proceedings are secret, and all that can be known about them is the conclusion to which they come.

But again, I am very clear that the legitimate business of this House and of Congress is quite sufficient to engross the attention thereof without assuming the judicial as well as legislative functions of the Government. It is a well-known fact that when the Court of Claims was first established it was merely a court to examine and report upon claims and their finding, whether pro or con, should be reported to Congress. When so reported and certified up the matter went into the hands of the Committee on Claims, and many just claims are yet slumbering from the year 1859—ten years ago. Those claims are, I fear, "sleeping the sleep that knows no waking." This kind of legislation is directly intended to throw obstacles in the way of honest claimants; but we have seen enough in the past few days to warrant the belief that when bankers and bondholders come before this House they are received with "hats off," and the utmost respect paid them. I sincerely hope that the amendment and the whole proviso will be defeated.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The question was put upon agreeing to the amendment; and there were—ayes 67, noes 49.

Mr. POLAND call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 79, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Blair, Bowen, Broomall, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick H. Butler, Callis, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dickey, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Beckley, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

An amendment to the following paragraph was read:

Department of State:

For compensation of the Secretary of State, two Assistant Secretaries of State, for chief clerk, eight clerks of class four, additional to one clerk of class four as disbursing clerk, eight clerks of class three, three clerks of class two, three clerks of class one, one messenger, one assistant messenger, and seven laborers, $58,140: Provided, That the pay of any messenger in either of the departments (legislative, executive, or judicial) of the Government employed during the whole year shall be $840 per annum, and no more; the pay of any assistant messenger employed as aforesaid shall be $700 per annum, and no more; and the pay of all laborers and watchmen (whether night or day) employed as aforesaid, shall be $600 per annum, and no more.

The amendment was to strike out "$600" and insert "$720" near the close of the paragraph.

Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts. I wish to briefly call the attention of the House to this matter, as there are quite a number of members here now who were not here when this amendment was made. The Committee on Appropriations fixed a scale for all the laborers and watchmen in all the Departments where the labor is by law fixed at eight hours a day; bringing the compensation down to what is now paid by private individuals for the same kind of service, we fixed the compensation at $600 a year. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PETERS.] offered this amendment, raising it to $720 a year. We fixed it where we did for the sake of economy; he proposes to raise it.

Mr. PETERS. I understood the gentleman to say that these watchmen and laborers are employed only eight hours a day. Now, I am of the opinion that those employed in the Treasury Department, especially those in the Revenue Bureau, are engaged in service for twelve hours a day. Last year the minimum pay allowed them was $720, the same as proposed in my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They are only engaged in watching twelve hours a day; but a day's work is by law limited to eight hours.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] I will say a word right here. I stated in debate the other day that the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury had been before the committee and we had consulted with him. I confronted him with another gentleman who appeared before the committee. He called on the committee this morning and desired that I should make this statement to the House. I suppose it is because his clerks and others employed by him might otherwise think that he came before the committee and endeavored to have their number reduced that he desires to have this impression corrected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 460) in relation to the meeting of the House of Representatives at the first session of the Forty-First Congress.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 1327) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 968) authorizing certain banks named therein to change their names.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PERHAM asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers relating to the application of James P. Earle for a pension.

Mr. PRUYN asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers relating to the application of the heirs of General Solomon Van Rensselaer for a pension.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

An amendment from the Committee of the Whole was read, to insert in the portion of the bill relating to the employés of the Treasury Department the following:

The compensation of the female clerks authorized by this section shall be the same as of clerks of the first class, and where employed on work performed by clerks of the higher classes they shall receive like compensation with the other clerks of such classes.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask a separate vote on the amendment just read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] allow three minutes debate on this amendment?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think there ought not to be any debate on it.

Mr. WARD. Does this amendment propose to increase the salaries of these female clerks?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It puts the salaries of all the female clerks in all the Departments up as high as the salaries of the male clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN. It puts the female clerks on the same footing with the male clerks so far as their salaries are concerned, nothing more.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On this amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 64, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Bingham, Boyer, Broomall, Burr, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Beckley, Ela, Fox, French, Garfield, G. T. Golladay, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kellogg, Kerr, Knott, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCullough, McKee, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Stone, Taber, Tift, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, John T. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodward, and Young—89.

YAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos B. Ashley, Bailey, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Grissold, Halsey, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, George V. NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Adams, Banks, Barnum, Beck, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boyden, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Caka, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Corley, Delano, Dickey, Dockery, Driggs, Edwards, Eggleston, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Goss, Hawkins, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Alexander H. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Bihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, James P. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—69.

So the amendment was agreed to.

THE SPEAKER. The time for the recess having arrived, this bill, according to the usage of the House, will go over till to-morrow morning as unfinished business. The hour of half past four o'clock p. m., having arrived, the House takes a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled, agreeably to order, at half past seven o'clock p. m.

MOSES F. SHINN.

MR. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (S. No. 467) to confirm an entry of land by Moses F. Shinn.

The bill provides for confirming the entry by Moses F. Shinn, of the northeast quarter of section sixteen in township fifteen, north of range thirteen east, in the district of lands subject to sale at Omaha, Nebraska, made on the 22d day of August, 1866, by cash certificate No. 1931.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROADS.

MR. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads; which was read a first and second time.

MR. FARNSWORTH. This bill simply designates post roads; it contains nothing in the shape of legislation. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill in full be dispensed with.

There being no objection, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

MR. PILE obtained leave of absence from to-night's session on account of sickness.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

MR. SCOFIELD. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the deficiency appropriation bill; but as preliminary to that motion I move that when the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon that bill all general debate terminate in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. SCOFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. PRICE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

The first reading of the bill was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

The reading of the bill was then proceeded with by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter there shall only be employed and paid for labor in the Treasury building and the five other buildings used by the Department for lighting, cleaning, and general care and superintendence thereof, the following persons, to wit, one superintendent, at a salary of $2,500 per year; one clerk of class four and one clerk of class one; one engineer in charge of heating apparatus, at a salary of $1,200 a year; five firemen, at a salary of $600 each per year; one machinist and gas-fitter, at a salary of $1,200 per year; one captain of the watch, at a salary of $1,400 per year; one storekeeper, at a salary of $1,000 per year; thirty watchmen, at a salary of $820 each per year; thirty laborers, at a salary of $600 each per year; seventy women as cleaners, at a salary of $180 each per year. *And it is hereby provided, That no account for contingent expenses at any of the bureaus of the Treasury Department shall hereafter be allowed except on the certificate of the general superintendent of the Treasury buildings that they are necessary and proper, and that the prices paid are just and reasonable; and the said superintendent shall keep a full, just, and accurate account in detail of all amounts expended under the head of contingent expenses for the several bureaus of the Treasury Department, which shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at every December session. And the expenditure for furniture and repairs for the same shall be made by the said superintendent, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and it shall be the duty of said superintendent to keep a just and accurate account in detail of all the amounts paid for the purchase of furniture, and also for the repairs thereof, as well as a full statement of the disposition of the old furniture; all of which shall be transmitted to Congress at every December session thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury. *And it is hereby provided further, That hereafter there shall be no payment made by any Department of the Government out of appropriations made for contingent and incidental expenses, for clerk hire, messengers, or laborers.

MR. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I make the point that the following proviso is independent legislation, and therefore not in order to an appropriation bill:

And it is hereby provided further, That hereafter there shall be no payment made by any Department of the Government out of appropriations made for contingent and incidental expenses, for clerk hire, messengers, or laborers.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the proviso will be stricken out.

MR. SCOFIELD. In the first part of the paragraph read by the Clerk I move to strike out the word "hereafter" and in lieu thereof to insert "after the present fiscal year."

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. KELSEY. I see that seventy women are employed as cleaners. Is not that a mistake? If it is intended to be so reported I move to reduce the number to twenty.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. HARDING. I move to strike out "six hundred" and insert "eight hundred;" so that the bill will then read: "thirty laborers at a salary of $800 each per year."

MR. CHAIRMAN. I submit to the House the propriety of adopting this amendment. We have heard the argument again and again why the salary of clerks in Washington should be increased. We all agree that it is difficult for men with families to live in this city on $1,200 a year. Here, then, it is proposed to pay these laborers $600 a year, who work a great many hours a day more than clerks. If it is right that clerks should have enough to keep themselves and families, I do not see why we should starve these laborers on a salary of $600 a year. Now, for one, I do not propose to starve them, and therefore I have moved an amendment increasing their pay to $800 a year.

MR. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to consume time in the discussion of this item. It has been discussed at various times in the House. The committee were of the opinion, and I am sure they are right, that $600 was more than these laborers could get from any other employer than the Government. If we make these salaries so much above the market price for this labor we will create a struggle for these places, and by paying these sums to single individuals we do not help the great body of laborers who have to take the market price for their labor.

MR. FARNSWORTH. This is not for laborers for the next fiscal year.

MR. SCOFIELD. It is for the past and for the remainder of the present fiscal year; that is up to the 3d of June.

MR. FARNSWORTH. Then this is to pay them what we agreed to pay them when they were hired.

MR. SCOFIELD. The great mass of them are not hired in that way. All I have to say is, I am willing the committee shall decide this question, but I would like to have it disposed of without debate, for I am anxious to dispose of the bill to-night, if possible. If the committee want to pay these men $800, of course they will do it. It is a question that is within the apprehension of every person upon a moment's consideration.

MR. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman inform the House how these persons are employed? I understood him to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that they were "not hired in that way." Now, this is a deficiency bill, and I suppose it is to supply deficiencies in the appropriations, making up for what is lacking for the present fiscal year. How are these men employed? Are not their wages fixed by some law in existence at this time?

MR. SCOFIELD. There is no law on the subject. We appropriate a round sum, and the Secretary of the Treasury has been in the habit of disbursing it as he sees fit, pretty much, giving no account. We have provided that hereafter we shall have a return of the whole disbursement of this fund, with the items and the persons to whom the money is paid. We have provided also the amount which he shall pay. I believe these women are paid by the week or month, about three dollars and fifty cents a week.

MR. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman know how many laborers are employed?

THE CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

MR. AXTELL. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment simply to say that in striking out these "seventy women" and reducing the number to "twenty" the committee have made a mistake. There are seventy cleaners employed now. They come to the buildings after the offices are closed in the evening and do this work. They are poor women and get the magnanimous sum of $180 a year for working two or three hours each day after the closing of the offices. If we strike out the appropriation for fifty of them I suppose they will be left to another Congress for their pittance to be provided for in another deficiency bill.

THE CHAIRMAN. This is not before the committee.

MR. AXTELL. It has been passed upon without the knowledge of many gentlemen. It only shows the necessity of watching these things.

MR. SCOFIELD. Does the Chair decide that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] is carried?

THE CHAIRMAN. It prevailed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I thought it was lost. I ask unanimous consent to recur to it again.

Mr. KELSEY. I inquired whether there was not a mistake. I supposed so great a number could not be needed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will state that the word "seventy" ought to be reinserted. I will also say that the amount paid to these women is very small per year. The reason is they are not employed all the day. They have to come in and clean up all the rooms and halls of the Treasury buildings at night. There are several buildings, and there is a very large space to be cleaned. The pay corresponds to the service. I hope there will be no objection to reinserting it.

No objection being made, the word "seventy" was restored.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a point of order, that from line thirteen to fifty-one it is new and independent legislation. It makes new provisions for the Treasury Department and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is aware that the paragraph has not only been read but amended. The point of order is therefore too late.

Mr. NIBLACK. The whole of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The whole paragraph; and the last part of it has been stricken out upon a point of order raised.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to strike out from lines thirteen to forty-eight inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order now; there is an amendment pending.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mine will be in order when that is disposed of, I suppose.

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. PAINE. Before the motion is made to strike out any part of the paragraph I desire to offer an amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HARDING, it was disagreed to.

Mr. PAINE. Before my colleague moves to strike out the entire paragraph I move to add at the end of the paragraph the following additional proviso:

And it is hereby provided further, That no part of the appropriation made by this act for contingent and incidental expenses shall be paid for clerk hire, messengers or laborers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I make the point of order on that amendment. It is the same thing that was stricken out just now on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAINE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. There is a difference between the proviso I offered and the one which was originally in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill contained this proviso:

And it is hereby provided further, That hereafter there shall be no payment made by any Department of the Government out of appropriations made for contingent and incidental expenses, for clerk hire, messengers, or laborers.

The point of order was made upon that that it was independent legislation. The Chair sustained the point of order and the proviso was stricken out. The gentleman from Wisconsin now offers an amendment similar to that, as the Chair understands, and the Chair, therefore, rules it out of order. From this decision the gentleman from Wisconsin appeals; and the question is "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. SCOFIELD. I appeal to my friend from Wisconsin to withdraw his appeal, so as not to consume time. I had always supposed the rule to be that where the amendment is a qualification upon the present appropriation it is in order, but if the Chair thinks otherwise I hope time will not be consumed, because the amendment may be offered again in the House. This is only a qualification on the present appropriation, and is not a general law.

Mr. PAINE. That is just what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will revise his decision. There are two words contained in the amendment that escaped his attention. The amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. PAINE. I want to say one word in support of my amendment. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] very properly objected to the proviso originally in the bill, and raised the point of order upon it, and it was ruled out because it covered not only this appropriation but future appropriations. The amendment which I propose is not obnoxious to any such objection as that, and it seems to me that we ought to incorporate into this bill precisely that provision, which will prevent the diversion of the appropriation meant for incidental and contingent expenses to the payment of clerk hire, messengers, or laborers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now move to strike out the entire paragraph, as amended, as follows:

And after the present fiscal year there shall only be employed and paid for labor in the Treasury building and the five other buildings used by the Department for lighting, cleaning, and general care and superintendence thereof the following persons, to wit: one superintendent, at a salary of $2,500 per year; one clerk of class four and one clerk of class one; one engineer in charge of heating apparatus, at a salary of $1,200 a year; five firemen, at a salary of $600 each per year; one machinist and gas-fitter, at a salary of $1,200 per year; one captain of the watch, at a salary of $1,400 per year; one storekeeper, at a salary of $1,000 per year; thirty watchmen, at a salary of $320 each per year; thirty laborers, at a salary of $600 each per year; seventy women as cleaners, at a salary of $180 each per year. And it is hereby provided, That no account for contingent expenses at any of the bureaus of the Treasury Department shall hereafter be allowed, except on the certificate of the general superintendent of the Treasury buildings that they are necessary and proper, and that the prices paid are just and reasonable; and the said superintendent shall keep a full, just, and accurate account in detail of all amounts expended under the head of contingent expenses for the several bureaus of the Treasury Department, which shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at every December session. And the expenditure for furniture and repairs for the same shall be made by the said superintendent, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and it shall be the duty of said superintendent to keep a just and accurate account in detail of all amounts paid for the purchase of furniture, and also for the repairs thereof, as well as a full statement of the disposition of the old furniture; all of which shall be transmitted to Congress at every December session thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury.

And it is hereby provided further, That no part of the appropriation made by this act for contingent and incidental expenses shall be paid for clerk hire, messengers, or laborers.

I make the motion because this is a deficiency bill, and it is manifestly improper to put upon such a bill independent legislation. A deficiency bill, it seems to me, ought not to cover anything but deficiencies.

At the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] I will modify my amendment and move to strike out from the word "and," in line twenty-nine, down to and including the word "Treasury," in line forty-eight, as follows:

And it is hereby provided, That no account for contingent expenses at any of the bureaus of the Treasury Department shall hereafter be allowed, except on the certificate of the general superintendent of the Treasury building that they are necessary and proper, and that the prices paid are just and reasonable; and the said superintendent shall keep a full, just, and accurate account in detail of all amounts expended under the head of contingent expenses for the several bureaus of the Treasury Department, which shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at every December session. And the expenditure for furniture and repairs for the same shall be made by the said superintendent, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and it shall be the duty of said superintendent to keep a just and accurate account in detail of all the amounts paid for the purchase of furniture, and also for the repairs thereof, as well as a full statement of the disposition of the old furniture; all of which shall be transmitted to Congress at every December session thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not propose to make any argument in favor of my amendment. It is apparent to everybody that this is legislation here for the purpose of sugar-coating the pill that this bill provides we shall take, or else it is to establish a different rule from that which is now provided by law. And I do not think that deficiency bills ought to contain any such provisions. They are intended to make up for what we have heretofore failed to appropriate; and they ought to be strictly confined to that purpose. This idea of making appropriation bills cover all kinds of legislation is manifestly an absurdity, and I hope this portion will be stricken out.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] and other members of the House should be watchful of legislation in an appropriation bill, and especially in a deficiency bill, and I honor them for their attention. But they will observe that all the legislation which is proposed in these bills is in favor of a greater accountability on the part of the officers charged with the disbursing of these funds, and also in favor of a greater economy. Therefore, if they desire, as I have no doubt they do, to carry honesty as well as economy into all the branches of the public service, they ought not to oppose this proposed legislation.

The portion of this paragraph now proposed to be stricken out is simply a provision that the superintendent of the Treasury building shall certify that the expenditures are necessary and proper; and also that certain expenses which he himself incurs, such as the purchase of furniture, now made without the supervision of any one, shall hereafter be supervised by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall himself, in turn, certify that this furniture was necessary and proper, and that an account of it shall be sent to Congress at its session in December next. My friend from Wisconsin will see that it is in the interest of economy and of honesty, although it may be, as he says, somewhat out of place in an appropriation bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that here is a provision simply for appropriations that we neglected to appropriate heretofore. I suppose these expenses have been in fact incurred already, or arrangements have been made to incur them.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The persons have been employed, and they have already earned their wages. Why, then, limit the action of the officers who are to pay them? Why not let them be paid under existing laws? And then, if the gentleman desires, I may go with him to establish the rule he seeks to establish here. But why put it on a deficiency bill? Why not keep those bills exclusively for deficiency purposes?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman is quite correct in his theory, but quite as much in error as to the fact. This appropriation is not for past expenses, but for future expenditures. The expenses which have been incurred up to the present time, and which will be incurred for some little time longer, will be paid out of money already appropriated. But this item of appropriation is to enable the Department to run until the 30th day of June next. They have had no right to anticipate this deficiency bill and to expend money not yet appropriated; and as a matter of fact, they have not done it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. ELDRIDGE; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend this paragraph by adding to it the following:

To complete the north wing of the Treasury building and approaches, including all liabilities, $163,500 20.

For repairs and preservation of public buildings, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Treasury Department and the several bureaus, $10,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to strike out the clause just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes, $400,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend this paragraph by adding to it the following:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid for clerk hire or other service, except to persons actually engaged in producing such issues in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to offer an amendment to this clause.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman can offer his amendment after the one I have offered has been acted on.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. SCOFIELD; and it was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to amend by adding to the pending paragraph the following additional paragraph:

And provided further, That no work shall be done in the Engraving and Printing Bureau for private parties or persons.

Mr. Chairman, I am reliably informed, although I have no personal knowledge on the subject, that Laban, Heath & Co., a Boston firm, are now having made at the Treasury Department for their own private purposes impressions of the different kinds of bonds and currency. The purpose, I understand, is to insert them in some book or to distribute them through the country in some form for private gain. The privilege which these parties are enjoying is one for which other parties are willing to pay $50,000. The precise manner in which this privilege was obtained I do not know. I have heard various theories suggested in regard to the matter. It is said that this work is done without the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury, but with the consent or connivance of some of the subordinates of the Department. As to that I have no definite information. But of one thing I am quite certain, that impressions of this sort ought not to go into private hands and be used for private purposes. Hence out of abundance of caution, the proviso which I have offered should, I think, be adopted.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It has not come to the knowledge of the Committee on Appropriations that any such abuse has crept into this Department; but there can be no objection, so far as I can see, to the amendment. Certainly I shall raise none.

Mr. WELKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] will allow me, I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] I would like to know from what source the gentleman from Indiana obtains his information?

Mr. NIBLACK. I get it from a gentleman who has been connected with the Treasury Department, and I believe still is, though I am not certain of that.

Mr. WELKER. The joint Committee on Retrenchment has been making a very thorough examination into all matters connected with the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department, and so far as I know have obtained no information of any such fact as that stated by the gentleman from Indiana. I should be glad if the gentleman would put some member of the committee in possession of any information he may have upon the subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. Any gentleman who may feel himself aggrieved by the statement I have made can learn from me privately the source of my information.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For supplying deficiency in the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, $50,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, $50,000.

This appropriation is in the estimates, and I am told it is indispensably necessary.

On the amendment, there were—ayes 16, noes 35; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] demand a further count?

Mr. SPALDING. I do.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. FARNSWORTH were appointed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire whether this appropriation is embraced in the estimates for the present fiscal year or for the next?

Mr. SPALDING. It is in the estimates of deficiencies for the present fiscal year. I am told that these clerks are now employed, and this appropriation is to pay them for their services.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I hope it will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order while the committee is dividing.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-two, noes not counted.

The CHAIRMAN. Less than a majority of a quorum voting in favor of the amendment it is not adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For amount required to supply deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of courts, $400,000; and hereafter there shall be no authority to employ and retain counsel to assist district attorneys without the further order of Congress.

Mr. AXTELL. I raise a point of order upon the last clause of this paragraph, beginning with the words "and hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to insert the following:

There shall be no money paid out of this appropriation to employ and retain counsel to assist district attorneys without further order of Congress.

Mr. AXTELL. I make the point that this is new legislation, and therefore not in order to an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The present reading of the amendment makes it clearly a limitation of the law and brings it within the rule.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know it is worth while to say anything on this amendment; but from the points of order raised on it there would appear to be considerable opposition to it. It came to the knowledge of the committee that, under a law passed during the war, when there was a great amount of business thrown upon the United States courts assistant counsel were employed by the district attorneys. In some districts I think they employed more than one. It came to the knowledge of the committee that these men were no longer needed.

Under that law a district attorney could employ an assistant counsel who would do all the duty of the office, while the district attorney paid no attention to it, but all the time drew a large salary. We thought that the law ought to be repealed and that the district attorneys should not be allowed to employ assistant counsel at all. It is not necessary at this time that they should have that power. The amendment was put on in a bungling way and was subject to the criticism of the gentleman from Wisconsin. It was put on for the purpose of doing good; for the purpose of effecting a reform and saving a large sum of money to the Treasury.

Mr. AXTELL. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If this amendment be adopted that assistant counsel shall not hereafter be employed, why then should we appropriate $400,000 to pay for such counsel? If the committee determines that practice shall not prevail in the future is this appropriation necessary?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It is all needed. When I can get the floor to do so I shall move to increase it to $500,000. I will say that it does not make any difference how much we appropriate in this clause, because it is all to be paid to judicial officers whose salaries are fixed by law. If we make it larger not a dollar can be paid except it is called for under the law.

Mr. BROOMALL's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now move to increase the appropriation to $500,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Why is that large increase necessary?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Department has notified us that it is needed.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. BURR. We will withdraw all opposition if we can have a satisfactory explanation why the Committee on Appropriations have made this mistake of $100,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I thought in reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Missouri I had answered that. The first estimate was for $400,000. The President sent a message to the House covering a letter from the Secretary of the Interior requesting that the appropriation should be increased to $500,000. It is to be paid on fixed salaries which cannot be enlarged or diminished. Perhaps the gentleman has read in the papers that the judges were not able to draw their salaries because the appropriation was exhausted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to insert the following:

For surveys of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coast, $40,000.

Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is to enable the Coast Survey to be carried on during the spring and until the 30th day of June next. The appropriation for that purpose is nearly exhausted. We have the officers regularly employed at a salary, and all the materials for carrying on the work, and the professor in charge of the Coast Survey says that the work is about to be stopped from mere lack of expense money.

More than this sum was asked for, but when the Superintendent came before the committee he concluded that he could get along with $40,000. Most gentlemen here know Professor Pierce, the Superintendent, who was mathematical professor at one of the New England colleges. He is a man of great learning. He is a man of probity, and we have the best assurance that the money will be carefully expended.

Mr. HARDING. This is a deficiency. How much has been appropriated during the year?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Nearly half a million. If I understand the gentleman correctly it is no deficiency, but an appropriation to continue that survey till the end of the present year. We appropriated for that purpose last year nearly half a million dollars, a very large sum, which in my opinion should be sufficient for any one year. I trust the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have now the appropriation for the last year. The whole sum for the Atlantic and Pacific coast was $445,000. This is a deficiency for the Atlantic coast alone.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does that include the item for repairs and maintenances of vessels, $30,000?

Mr. SCOFIELD. That covers everything.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The law of last year provided for the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coast, $275,000; for the western coast of the United States, $130,000; for publishing observations, $5,000; for pay, rations, &c., $10,000; and for repairs and maintenance of complement of vessels, $30,000; approximating nearly to the amount I stated, namely, $500,000 for the last year. And now we are asked to appropriate to continue the survey during the rest of the year $50,000 more. It is certainly a degree of extravagance that is unnecessary, in my judgment, in the present state of the public Treasury.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The estimate sent us by the Department in the first place for this deficiency was $160,000, and we have cut it down to $40,000, which we think is pretty small. I expected to get some credit in the House for the zeal with which we have whittled down this item. While I always go for the smallest appropriation I could not find any way to dodge this, and so I had to vote for it myself. I believe the whole committee indorse it unanimously. The Committee of the Whole may do with it as they see fit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the amount to $25,000. I hope the amendment of the committee will not be adopted. If there is an extravagant feature in this Government, considering the nature of the duties performed, it is this Coast Survey. I have never known a gentleman connected with the Committee on Appropriations who was able to explain the cause of this everlasting expense. The constant tendency of this particular branch of the service is to a deficiency. The vessels are furnished by the Government, the officers are in the pay of the Government, and yet hundreds of thousands of dollars are appropriated annually for this purpose.

Mr. HARDING. Some civilians, I think, are engaged in this survey; it is not exclusively done by persons belonging to the Navy. That is my information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed all the officers performing this duty were in some form or other salaried men and paid out of other appropriations, and that the whole amount expended under this appropriation was for contingent expenses. There has never been, so far as I am informed, an intelligent statement to the House of the cause of this enormous expenditure. It is a very proper branch of the service; it is indispensable; but it seems to me there is no necessity for expending so large a sum year after year without any explanation. I think we have a right to require some explanation.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to make a slight amendment of the figures I presented a moment ago. I find there has been appropriated for the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, for the Pacific, and for the northern and northwestern lakes (I did not include the latter before) the sum of $525,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Add to that the salaries of the officers employed, the cost of the vessels brought into the service, and the expenditure for the Coast Survey runs up into millions annually. I trust this branch of the service, unexplained as it is, will be limited to the annual appropriation, and that the favor which is sometimes extended to other branches of the service will not be extended to this. I withdraw the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SCOFIELD, there were—ayes 61, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCOFIELD and BENJAMIN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows under the head of "House of Representatives:—"

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for laborers, $9,975.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment, to come in after line seventy-two:

To defray expenses of joint Committee on Retrenchment, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That said sum shall be drawn from the Treasury upon the order of the Secretary of the Senate as the same shall be required, and any portion of the amount hereby appropriated that shall be allowed by said joint committee to witnesses attending before it or persons employed in its service for per diem, traveling, and other necessary expenses paid by said Secretary in pursuance of the orders of said committee shall be accordingly allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

To pay balance due for twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Representative and Delegate and one hundred copies for the House Library in the second session of the Fortieth Congress, $18,420.

To pay for twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Representative and Delegate and one hundred copies for the House Library and for pages in excess of one thousand five hundred in the third session of the Fortieth Congress, $28,452.

To pay for reporting and printing the debates and proceedings in the Daily Globe, $2,730.

To pay for complete sets of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for new members entitled to receive the same under the law of July 4, 1861, $7,518.

Mr. AXTELL. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in relation to these Congressional Globes. I am informed that they are not furnished to the judges of the Supreme Court, and I would like the amendment to contain an appropriation for copies of the Globe for each one of the justices of the Supreme Court. I think it would be very proper.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would inform the gentleman from California that the Committee on Appropriations have no power to contract with the printers of the Globe to furnish any other copies than those for which we have a contract. We make the appropriation just as the law stands.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire if we did not appropriate money two years ago to pay for complete sets of the Globe for new members of the present Congress under the contract? Now, then, what new members are there that have come in since?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will inform the gentleman from Illinois that there was such an appropriation two years ago, and the books were furnished in accordance with the contract made with the owners of the Globe to the amount of the appropriation. New members have since come in—the southern members and others who were entitled under the law to get these Globes. So far as this amendment relates to complete sets of the Globe it is to pay that deficiency.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This is for new members who have come in since the commencement of this Congress?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It is.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

New Mexico:

For salary of the secretary of the Territory as ex officio superintendent of the public grounds, from July 28, 1868, to June 30, 1869, at $1,000 per annum, $920 33: Provided, That after the expiration of the present fiscal year the said secretary shall only receive $2,000 per annum, and no more, in full compensation for all official services, whether as secretary or superintendent of public buildings and grounds.

Mr. PAINE. I move to strike out all that relates to the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, and I will state to the committee why I make that motion. By the act passed July 27, 1868, it was provided that the annual salary of the secretary of this Territory should be $2,000 from and after the 1st day of February, 1867, and by that act we gave him $1,000 for his services as superintendent of public buildings and grounds. Now, in this same year, 1868, in the appropriation bill of July 20, 1868, we appropriated $12,000 to pay the salaries of the Governor, secretary, chief justice, and two associate justices of that Territory; and what is their salary? The salary of the Governor, as it stands here in the law which I have before me, raised to its highest figure, is $2,500; that of the secretary is $2,000, unless you add the $1,000 for superintending public grounds, which by this proviso we have no right to do; then the salary of the chief justice and two associate justices is $2,000 each, making $6,000; so that the entire amount of the salaries of these officers is $10,500, if you do not allow the secretary $1,000 for superintending the public grounds in addition to the $2,000. Now, it appears to me that that proviso cuts off the addition, excludes the possibility of adding the $1,000 to the $2,000 allowed by law; but if you do add the $1,000, then the entire salaries of these five officers will be $11,500, and we appropriated $12,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Has he the law before him creating this superintendency of public grounds?

Mr. PAINE. I have.

Mr. SPALDING. The committee looked at that law and concluded that it made the pay perpetual. The object of this provision is to repeal that act if we can do so.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman does not understand me. I have moved to strike out the whole of the provision relating to this officer. Even if he is to receive a salary of $3,000 we have already appropriated $500 more than is required to pay all these officers, because, as I have shown, if you give this additional $1,000 to this secretary the salaries for all the officers are but $11,500. If you cut off this additional $1,000 you will then have to pay but $10,500; and we appropriated $12,500 in the act of July 27, 1868. Under either construction of the act there is no deficiency; put whatever construction you will upon it there is already a surplus and not a deficiency. I see, therefore, no reason for appropriating for a deficiency when none exists.

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot understand the reasoning of the gentleman. Suppose that we have appropriated $11,000.

Mr. PAINE. Twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. SPALDING. Suppose the appropriation had been $12,000 or even $20,000; this secretary could draw only his salary as secretary, $2,000, and as superintendent of the public grounds, $1,000. If there was $1,000 of the appropriation left he has no benefit of it. But he now comes in and requires us to pay the balance of the salary as superintendent. That is what we are providing for here, and we want to stop it hereafter.

Mr. PAINE. At the conclusion of the section of the act which gives the secretary of that Territory $1,000 as superintendent of public grounds is found a proviso in these words:

Provided, That the annual salary of the secretary of said Territory shall be $2,000 per annum from and after the 1st day of February, 1867.

Now, his salary never was $2,000 a year before this act was passed; it was only $1,800. Now, if you are to give him $3,000, including $1,000 for salary as superintendent of public grounds, I do not exactly understand what that proviso means. I hold that $2,000 is the maximum of his salary. But I say that even if his salary is $3,000 we have already made an appropriation sufficient to pay him and all the officers of the Territory and $500 over.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. PAINE, to strike out the paragraph; and it was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Colorado:

For supplying deficiency in the appropriation for the salaries of the Governor, judges, and secretary, caused by the increase of compensation to the judges, by act of March 2, 1867, $1,000.

Dakota:

For amount required to pay the increased salaries to the judges of Dakota Territory, authorized by act of March 2, 1867, $5,000.

Idaho Territory:

For amount required to pay increased salaries to the judges of the Territory of Idaho, authorized by act of March 2, 1867, $3,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to insert the following after the last paragraph read:

For refunding to the appropriation for the legislative expenses of Idaho Territory the amount advanced from this fund and not accounted for by the secretary of said Territory, $38,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Montana Territory:

For amount required to pay the increased salaries of the judges, authorized by the act of March 2, 1867, $2,500.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to insert the following after the paragraph just read:

For amount required to pay outstanding liabilities on account of compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I move to insert the following after the amendment just adopted:

Provided, That from and after the 30th day of June next the salaries of the judges of Utah Territory shall be the same as now paid to judges in Idaho and Montana Territories.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I raise the point of order that this is not a deficiency and not in order on this bill.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I hope no objection will be made to my amendment as it is certainly just and proper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have examined this matter and I am satisfied this amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 30, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for tellers. This is a perfectly just amendment, and should be adopted. It simply puts this judge on an equality as to salary with other territorial judges.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. SPALDING were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-seven, noes not counted. So the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wyoming Territory:

For the expenses of the Territory from January 1, 1868, to June 30, 1869, namely:
For Governor, $1,500.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "1868," and inserting "1869;" so as to read "1869." This Territory was not organized as early as January, 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by striking out the pending paragraph. I offer this amendment for the purpose of inquiring whether there is any territorial government of Wyoming. If not, why should we appropriate this considerable amount of money for this Territory? I believe there is as yet neither a Governor, a secretary, nor a Legislature in Wyoming. This is an appropriation from January 1, 1869, till June 30, 1869. The Delegate from Dakota directs my attention to the provision of a succeeding paragraph, that—

The compensation of the said officers of the said Territory of Wyoming shall not commence until they shall have been commissioned and qualified.

But there is an appropriation of $10,000 for the Legislative Assembly of the Territory. I believe the Legislative Assembly of that Territory has never met. I ask the gentleman having charge of this bill whether a Legislature has been elected, and if so, whether it will assemble during the present fiscal year?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Territory of Wyoming has been organized, but the officers have not entered on their duties because the selections of the President were not confirmed by the Senate. Under the supposition that officers would be appointed and would be confirmed by the Senate in accordance with the recommendation of the Department the committee inserted the appropriations necessary to pay their salaries; but they added a proviso that the salaries shall not commence till the officers shall have been actually commissioned. No portion of this sum can go to pay for services prior to the date of the commission.

Mr. COOK. I would like to inquire whether the act organizing this Territory did not expressly provide that it should not take effect till the territorial officers had been respectively appointed and qualified?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think that is the fact. But this appropriation is not inconsistent with that legislation.

Mr. COOK. Is there not such an inconsistency in the appropriation for the salary of the secretary? for the proviso embraced in this bill does not cover that appropriation.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. I was about to ask my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] substantially the same question which has been put by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook;] that is, whether the proviso in this bill covers the case of the secretary of this Territory? The proviso refers apparently to the officers named in the preceding part of the bill, and the appropriation for the secretary comes afterward. The same remark is true with regard to the officers of the Legislature for whom an appropriation of $10,000 is made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. To remedy the difficulty which has been suggested I will at the proper time move an amendment to the proviso striking out the word "said" before "officers." The proviso was designed to apply to all the officers of the Territory.

Mr. POLAND. I wish to inquire whether these appropriations are not in some way affected by the provision we adopted last night making the sessions of the Legislatures of all these Territories biennial? I understand that this appropriation is merely to pay the expenses of the territorial Legislature up to the end of the present fiscal year. But, sir, no Legislature has yet been elected.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is a contingency. The gentleman will see that we make an appropriation for this territorial Legislature, and not for the others.

Mr. POLAND. Is there any reason to suppose there will be a territorial Legislature before the end of this fiscal year, so there will be a need for any appropriation at all? We made an appropriation for the next fiscal year in the bill which went through last night.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It is expected that the Legislature will meet there before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For chief justice and two associate justices, $2,500 each, $3,750: Provided, That the compensation of the said officers of the said Territory of Wyoming shall not commence until they shall have been commissioned and qualified.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to transfer that proviso to the end of the appropriations for the Territory of Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move the following amendment:

For blank-books, stationery, book-cases, arms of the United States, seals, presses, flags, postages, and miscellaneous expenses of the consuls of the United States, including loss by exchange, $15,000.

For the incidental and contingent expenses of Department of State:

For stationery, furniture, fixtures, and repairs, $2,000.

For general purposes of the building occupied by the Department of State:

For rent, fuel, alterations, watchmen, and laborers, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Patent Office Building:

For casual repairs of the Patent Office building, $5,000.

Mr. ELA. I move to strike that appropriation out of the bill, and I do this for the purpose of ascertaining whether this $5,000 is appropriated to pay for taking up the tiling at the Patent Office and replacing it with marble. I understand that the tiling which was taken up was better and would sell for more than the marble blocks which were put down in its place.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I suppose not, but I have no knowledge on the subject. The Department sent in an estimate for $5,000 as expenses to keep up the building during the remainder of this fiscal year. When we consider the large size of the building and its extensiveness, we thought that something about that amount would be required. No member of the committee, so far as I know, went into an examination of the details.

Mr. ELA. If I understand the question rightly, and I think I do, the Patent Office has been retiled at an expense of $1 25 a foot, better tiling having been taken up than that with which it was replaced. And besides that unnecessary expense, walls along which the tiling was placed have been left in an incomplete condition, and a certain amount of masonry will be required to complete it. For that reason I desire to strike out the whole of that paragraph. I think the Committee on Appropriations will find the facts I have stated to be correct.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move the following amendment:

For salary of the judge advocate of the Navy Department, from the 4th of March to July 1, 1869, $1,167.

The office is abolished after the 30th of June next, and this appropriation is to pay the salary until that time.

Mr. STOVER. The gentleman moves an appropriation for four months which will make this man's salary about four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is the amount of the salary provided by law for that length of time.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There was no such office as judge advocate of the Navy Department prior to the war; but during the war such an office was created. The law, however, expressly provided that it should cease at the close of the war. When the war closed an appropriation was inserted in one of the appropriation bills making an appropriation for the contingency of the office for another year. This is part of the same scheme of continuing in office, which does not exist by law, and which is as unnecessary as a judge advocate of the House of Representatives would be. The office has expired by limitation, and this appropriation is a totally useless expenditure of public money. It is only another example of the tenacity with which men will cling to office long after the necessity for it has ceased. It is time that we should put a stop to such a practice.

Mr. TWICHELL. I move to strike out the last word. I know that it is unusual for the gentleman from Ohio to be mistaken, but he is mistaken in this instance, for this office does not expire by limitation until the 30th day of June next.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Where?

Mr. TWICHELL. There is a law of Congress. It is simply proposed to pay $1,167 for the four months' service, the office being continued till the 30th of June by law.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to insert the following:

For the continuation of the work on the United States court-house and post office at Madison, Wisconsin, $25,000.

I believe the Committee on Appropriations concede that this appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. FOX. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is not made in time.

Mr. FOX. I made it as soon as I could.

The CHAIRMAN. Not till after the amendment had been debated.

Mr. HOPKINS. So far from this being new legislation I will inform the gentleman that the appropriation asked for by the Department for this building is $50,000. The amount I move to insert is $25,000. This building is about half completed. The materials are all on the ground. The money which has been appropriated heretofore is all expended, and unless we get this appropriation at this time the work must stop. The Government of the United States is paying a large amount every year for rent of offices in Madison, and it is economy for the Government to continue this work. With this $25,000 we expect to be able to inclose the building this year. Unless we get it the completion of the house is delayed till another year. I do not believe there is a man in this House who, if he had this building to complete for himself, would hesitate to make the outlay. It is a matter of economy to go on with this work, and every member of the Committee on Appropriations concedes that the appropriation is proper. I trust there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations considered this proposition; they heard the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I believe they all thought there was a good deal of force in it. But they were beset on all sides for similar appropriations, and they feared if they opened the door to one which might seem a little more meritorious than another they must let them all in and the aggregate amount would be so large that the Treasury could not afford it this year. Therefore they concluded not to put in any of these propositions. Of course the Committee of the Whole can act upon the amendment as they see fit. They have heard what the gentleman says, and that is all there is of it I believe.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman will admit that this is but one half the amount which has been estimated for by the Department.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. That is so.

Mr. PAINE. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there are other instances that have come to the notice of the committee where buildings are in process of erection as this is, so that the labor already performed would be in a measure lost if the appropriation is not made?

Mr. SPALDING. There are some eight or ten others.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the appropriation to $24,000, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Wisconsin what amount was appropriated last year for this court-house and post office?

Mr. HOPKINS. The amount was $100,000, and the estimate to complete the building was about $250,000. The $25,000 now asked for will put the roof on during the present year, and unless we get it the work will be delayed till another year, putting the Government to additional rent for the offices it now occupies.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then it seems we have appropriated and have expended already during the present fiscal year $100,000 for this building. If there is any necessity for this appropriation that amount must have been expended between the 1st of July last and the present time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state the reason for the expenditure. The materials for the building have been bought and paid for. The stone is on the ground, the lumber and the iron girders are ready, but the appropriation being exhausted we have nothing left to continue the work in the spring unless we get this appropriation. Everybody who knows anything about our northern climate knows that our seasons at best are very short, and unless we can commence the work in the spring, as this appropriation will enable us to do, we lose the whole season and the Government loses it. I am not speaking in behalf of myself, but because I know that it is for the interest of the Government to complete this building.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman has given the best reason in the world why the appropriation should not be made. We made a very liberal appropriation at the last session of Congress for this work. The parties in charge of the work should not have expended the entire amount, if they wanted to keep the laborers employed and the work going on, within the first six months of the year and then come here and ask for another amount in the deficiency bill. All of these public works that are being constructed by the Government, I presume, are in the same fix, and the gentlemen representing the districts where they are located come in and ask for deficiencies to continue the works, alleging that their appropriations are entirely exhausted; and it will require millions of dollars to continue them upon this principle. As I said before we appropriated $100,000 for this court-house last year. I do not know, neither has the gentleman stated to us, how much more it will require to complete the building.

Mr. HOPKINS. I stated before that the estimate for this building—and it was known when the work was commenced—was $250,000. That is no more than is required to build a respectable building and no more than has been expended for the same purpose in other places of the same size. I will state to the gentleman that nothing has been done on the part of the friends of this work that is unfair toward the House in keeping back any facts in reference to it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let me ask the gentleman from Wisconsin another question. How much money has been already expended?

Mr. HOPKINS. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated by the last Congress, [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes seventy-seven, noes not counted.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer the following amendment, to come in immediately after the one just adopted:

For construction of a public building at Springfield, Illinois, for a court-house and post office and accommodation of officers of the United States, $25,000.

I desire to state to the committee that there has been a little over two hundred thousand dollars expended by the Government for a building at the town in which I live, Springfield, Illinois. The building is erected so far as the walls are concerned. The roof is upon the building, the doors are in the building, and I believe the windows are in also. The building is in that condition. The Government is paying six or eight thousand dollars, I do not recollect the exact amount now, for rent for a court-house, for a post office, for a pension office, and for offices for the various revenue officers of the Government in that town.

I desire to say further—for I do not want to mislead the House in any way—that the amount appropriated for this purpose last year was not quite sufficient to put the building in the condition in which it now is, and that the superintendent, at my own suggestion, feeling that it was necessary to do it in order to protect the public property, went forward and put in the doors and windows and finished the putting on of the roof so that the building might not be injured, which results in there being an amount due to the laborers employed upon the building which the Government has not got the money to pay. There has been this amount expended. I do not think it necessary for me to take up the time of the committee in urging the importance of making this small appropriation so that the building may be completed and the Government may get the use of it for a court-house and post office and other offices. I believe that the Committee on Appropriations substantially coincide with me in the opinion that this small appropriation ought to be put in the bill, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will say that I thought the Springfield case was about the strongest of all; but I go against them all.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reduce the amount called for by this amendment $1,000. I do not know that it would be of any use for me to attempt to resist these various appropriations. I believe we all came here at the commencement of this session making loud professions of economy, declaring that we were going to endeavor to curtail the expenses of this Government and to reduce the taxes of the people.

Now, in regard to this Springfield court-house I desire to say that we made two appropriations for that purpose at the last session of Congress. In the first place we made an appropriation of $25,000. Afterward we were asked by the gentleman who has proposed this amendment [Mr. CULLOM] to make a further appropriation of $30,000. At the time he asked for that appropriation he said that only that amount was needed to complete the building. We appropriated the amount asked for, and provided in making it that that amount should complete the building. Gentlemen will find by reference to the act of July 20, 1868, the following clause:

"To complete the building used for a court-house and post office at Springfield, Illinois, $30,000."

That makes $55,000 that we appropriated last year upon the assurance that the building should be completed for that sum and in the manner provided for in the law. We are now called upon by the same gentleman [Mr. CULLOM] to make another appropriation. And he now states that this additional sum is necessary to complete the building. And unless some stop is put to this business it will go on in the same way from year to year. I am opposed to all these appropriations to continue these works except in cases where they are absolutely necessary; and so far as my vote goes it shall be cast against any appropriation where we have provided by law that the amount heretofore appropriated shall complete the building.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the gentleman regard it as economy, after this building has been closed in at a cost of $200,000, to let the building remain unfinished and rent other buildings merely because the words he has read are in some previous law?

Mr. BENJAMIN. If we state that the amount appropriated shall complete the building we should hold the party who has had charge of the work responsible for going beyond the direction made by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. That is a very good argument to make, but everybody knows that it is not carried out in any instance.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then it is time it was carried out, and I know no better time for the purpose than the present.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the Government has done the best it could in carrying on this work, but the building is not yet finished.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. CULLOM.

Mr. MULLINS. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:

For a custom-house and post office building at Nashville, Tennessee, $25,000.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I raise the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CULLOM.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. CULLOM; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 31; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. A majority of those voting have voted in the affirmative. Is a further count called for?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes; let there be a further count.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon a further count, as it may break up the committee for want of a quorum.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think if we are going on in this way the sooner we break up this committee the better.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CULLOM and Mr. BENJAMIN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 76, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MULLINS. I move to insert after the amendment just adopted the following:

For a custom-house and post office building at Nashville, Tennessee, $25,000.

I will detain the committee but a few moments in explaining this amendment. About fifteen years ago the Government of the United States appropriated $100,000 for a building of this character in the city of Nashville. The location was made and the ground laid out by the engineer sent there by the Government, and a temporary building was put up; but that became so dilapidated that it was finally converted into a coal-house. [Laughter.] The United States courts are now held in the State capitol. A building in the neighborhood is rented by the Government for a post office; and that building is now in a disgracefully dilapidated condition, fit for nothing in the world but a den for gopher rats. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. If the Government erects a new building, is there not danger that the Kuklux may take it for their headquarters? [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. Why, sir, the present building is just such a one as is fitted to breed

Kuklux. [Laughter.] Tear it down and erect a proper building and in my opinion we shall get rid of the Kuklux. The present building, after you get above the first story, is as complete a wreck of a building as you can find perhaps in all Nashville. Yet the Government is paying to-day $1,500 a year for the occupation of that building. The custom-house, I believe, is somewhere on the wharf; and a good many of the rats are devouring what little is there. The squabble between the excise officers and the gopher rats has become a pretty serious matter. [Laughter.] Last year an appropriation of $25,000 for this building was adopted by this House; but when it went to the Senate it was reduced to five thousand or two thousand dollars, not enough to engage men to look up timber for beginning the work. I ask that the appropriation named in my amendment be made. When in Nashville last week I was assured that with this appropriation the work would be pushed forward forthwith. The erection of a new building would save the Government an annual expense of $1,500 for rent, which has been running on for the last fifteen years. The Government should not be required to use that terrible rat-den any longer for a post office.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the Department has not asked anything for this work. It is not in the estimates of any branch of the Government. In order that we may get through with this bill to-night I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed upon the last paragraph.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope that will not be agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask, then, that debate be limited to three minutes on each amendment, two minutes to be occupied by the member offering the amendment, and one minute by any member wishing to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD?]

There was no objection.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MULLINS, it was not agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend by adding the following:

For construction of appraisers' stores at Philadelphia, $37,500.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to know whether that work is authorized by any existing law? If not I raise a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. The Secretary of the Treasury has asked the appropriation of $75,000 in this deficiency bill for the purpose of carrying on the construction of this building. It is now in an unfinished condition. Appropriations for this work have been made during the last two or three years; and the building is now up as far as the third story. If it be not pushed forward to completion, it will of course go to decay; and until it is finished the Government must continue to pay a rental of $16,000 annually for the appraisers' stores necessary to accommodate the commerce of Philadelphia. So urgent is the necessity for this building, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he has asked an appropriation of $100,000 more in the miscellaneous appropriation bill. Other gentlemen in advocating appropriations for similar works have very properly urged upon the House the duty of pushing to completion buildings of this description. It would be utterly wasteful for the Government to allow this building to remain but half finished. The work, so far as it has gone, has been done in the most thorough as well as the most economical manner; and when it is finished we shall have a suitable building for appraisers' stores, so that the present system of renting stores from private individuals may be discontinued. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. This is very much like the other propositions which the committee have adopted. The Department estimated $75,000 for the deficiency in this instance, and the gentleman has moved an amendment for one half that sum. I suppose that as the others have been adopted this also will be agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to reduce it to $1,000; and I wish to say a word on the subject.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The debate has closed on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the order of the committee by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is not the amendment to the amendment debatable?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The time for debate on each original amendment was fixed, and the debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The committee divided on Mr. O'NEILL's amendment; and there were—ayes 39, noes 29; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. O'NEILL and Mr. BENJAMIN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 51.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAUM. I move the following amendment:

For the construction of the public building at Cairo, Illinois, to be used as a post office, custom-house, and the United States court-room, $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, that building is now well under way, and I have a photograph in my hand which discloses the condition in which it is at the present time. The second story is nearly completed. The stone is on the ground to build the second story, as well as the lumber for the entire building. The estimate is for $50,000, and I have consented to the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations to accept $25,000. I hope the amendment will be sustained. This is an important work. It is for the post office, custom-house, and court-room. Buildings for these purposes are now rented at considerable expense to the United States. The post office there is a large one: the postmaster receives a salary of $3,700. I earnestly desire that the House will adopt the amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

For the erection of a post office at Confederate Cross Roads, which is in the State of Kentucky, and repairing Bascom's grocery, $25,000.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This building at Cairo is in the same condition as the others for which appropriations have been made. The Department recommended $50,000 and the gentleman asks for $25,000. As the others have been adopted I do not see any good reason why we should reject this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to insert, as follows:

To secure the location of a post office and court-house in the city of Brooklyn, New York, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, the modesty of the Representatives from that section of the State has been such as to deprive their constituency from proper recognition in bills for the construction and completion of buildings of this character. It may not be generally known, but the city of Brooklyn has at this time a population of over four hundred thousand inhabitants, and is as deserving of the patronage of this Government as any other place in the United States; for it has paid during the last year into the national Treasury, in the shape of internal taxes, $9,000,000. The Government now pays a rent of $5,000 per annum for a post office building, and $6,000, I believe, for a court-house. The Government does not own a single foot of real estate in the city of Brooklyn to-day, and it is a matter of much interest that it should secure a location for this building at the earliest possible moment. Every one familiar with the course of the values of property in that locality knows that there is not a single place in the whole country where property has advanced so rapidly as in the city of Brooklyn. Since the proposition made last year for this purpose the location then fixed, on has been enhanced in price one hundred per cent. It would cost to-day twice as much as it could have been bought for then.

I make these remarks for the purpose of attracting the attention of the House to this subject, so that in the future investigations of the Committee on Appropriations that portion of the Union may not be overlooked in the appropriations for the construction of these buildings.

Mr. LYNCH. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I wish to state the principle which will control my action on these subjects. I oppose this appropriation because it is for new work, but I will vote for the ten buildings estimated for because I believe really that is a matter of public economy. These buildings are from one half to two thirds completed, and the question now is not whether they shall commence, but whether they shall be completed and save the Government the money already expended. Until they are completed the Government will have to pay rent for the buildings now used. In my judgement it is a false economy to refuse to complete them when by so doing we could save the expense yearly of vast sums of rent.

The amendment of Mr. BARNES was disagreed to.

Mr. HULBURD. I move the following amendment:

For construction of custom-house at Ogdensburg, New York, $12,500.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment. The gentleman has said all he desires to, and in opposition to it I will only say that this is on the same footing as all the others. If the rest come in this ought to. The Department recommends $25,000 and the gentleman moves to insert half that amount.

The question being put on the amendment, there were—ayes 43, noes 31; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HULBURD and BENJAMIN were appointed.

The committee divided; but without any report from the tellers, Mr. HULBURD withdrew the amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The committee continued here last night till near twelve o'clock. I find we cannot finish this bill to-night, as gentlemen insist on having a vote by tellers on every proposition. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PRICE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

M'PHERSON MONUMENT.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPherson monument, for present action. I am quite sure there will be no objection to it.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish to the McPherson Monument Association of Clyde, Ohio, four pieces of condemned iron cannon, four of brass cannon, twenty-five cannon balls, and one thousand muskets with bayonets, to be placed about the monument.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope there will not be a dissenting voice.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to suspend the rules. The motion was agreed to; two thirds voting in favor thereof.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. ROSS, (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BENTON: The petition of William A. Parker, to be restored to the active list of the Navy of the United States.

By Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts: Petitions of Daniel Ricketson and 87 others, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, and Caroline C. Metcalf and others, of Norton, Massachusetts, praying for right of female suffrage.

By Mr. MERCUR: A petition of 38 citizens of Bradford county, Pennsylvania, praying that the Constitution of the United States may be so amended as to acknowledge Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, and the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the nations and His revealed will as of supreme authority in order to constitute a Christian Government.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: Two petitions from citizens of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying that the Constitution be so amended as to acknowledge Almighty God as the source of all civil power.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. DRAKE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY presented four memorials of citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the relief of Polly Hunt for the revival of an expired patent for paper collars; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OSBORN presented the petition of the president of the Pensacola and Louisville railroad, praying a grant of land to aid in rebuilding that railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of John W. Smith and Priscilla Smith, of Columbia county, Florida, praying compensation for property destroyed during the late war by the public enemy at Beaufort, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SAWYER presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Charleston, South Carolina, remonstrating against the revival of extinct provisions of bankrupt laws; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Charleston, South Carolina, in favor of protection of private property at sea during war; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Commerce have had under consideration a petition of Perry McDonough Collins, praying the aid of the Government and the right of way for the erection of a telegraph by way of the North Pacific ocean to Asia and a survey and soundings of the proposed route, and have instructed me to report it back, a bill having been reported on the subject, and ask that it lie on the table.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A bill (H. R. No. 728) relating to the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department;

A bill (H. R. No. 616) extending the provisions of the act of July 17, 1862, relating to the naturalization of soldiers, to those who enlisted in the naval and marine service of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 590) to establish the assimilated rank of the staff officers of the Navy;

A bill (S. No. 172) making further provision for widows and heirs of officers of the Navy, and for establishing naval life insurance;

A bill (S. No. 44) to amend an act entitled "An act to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, and for other purposes," approved July 25, 1866;

A bill (S. No. 833) for the reorganization of the Navy of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 750) to regulate the rank of the medical staff of the Navy;

A bill (S. No. 749) to define and settle staff rank in the Navy;

A bill (S. No. 720) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 185) for the relief of William B. Whiting, a captain, formerly a commander in the Navy of the United States on the retired list;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 285) granting prize money to any officer, seaman, marine, landsman, or other person who served in the Navy of the United States and was captured in the line of his duty;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) for the promotion of certain commodores on the retired list to rear admirals on the retired list of the Navy; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 342) for the restoration of Commander Greenleaf Cilley and Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 225) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place a vessel at the disposal of the Commissioners of Charities and Corrections of the city of New York, to be used for the purposes of a nautical school, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the following petitions, memorials, letters, and reports, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

The petition of Dr. Edward Delafeld, president, and others, professors and students at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the city of New York, in favor of the bill for the reorganization of the medical corps of the Navy;

The petition of the president, professors, and students of medicine of the University of New York, praying a reorganization of the medical department of the Navy of the United States;

A petition of iron manufacturers and engineers of Baltimore, praying that the rank assigned the engineers and other staff officers by the Navy Department be confirmed by law of Congress, and a continuation of the system of education of our naval engineers at the United States Naval Academy;

The petition of Hannah Tyndall, Hannah Lewis, and Susan Phipic, praying that the widows and orphans of seamen, marines, sailors, and others serving in the Navy of the United States may receive the same benefit as now enjoyed by relatives of soldiers as regards bounty;

The petition of the assistant professors of the United States Naval Academy, praying an increase of compensation;

The petition of R. B. Hitchcock, retired commodore United States Navy, praying to be allowed the rank of rear admiral in the Navy on the retired list;

The petition of professors and students of medicine at the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, praying a reorganization of the medical corps of the Navy;

The petition of Cincinnatus W. Harper and Clarence C. Harper, children and heirs-at-law of the late John Harper, deceased, praying compensation for the use and occupation of their land by the United States Government in the county of Norfolk and State of Virginia for hospital and navy-yard purposes;

The petition of E. R. Knorr, praying that the plates bought from E. & G. W. Blunt by the Secretary of the Navy for the Government be destroyed, and that in place of them new charts, not copies of the English, but improvements on them, be prepared from all reliable data;

The petition of William W. Wood and John L. Lay, inventors of an improved torpedo used in the destruction of the rebel ram Albemarle, praying compensation therefor;

The petition of William C. Hanford, praying compensation for the invention of a machine for the protection of vessels from being destroyed by torpedoes;

The petition of John Guest, captain United States Navy, praying the passage of the bill (S. No. 172) making further provisions for widows and heirs of officers of the Navy, and for establishing naval life insurance;

The petition of naval officers at League Island, praying relief for Mrs. Jane Dean Bishop, widow of William S. Bishop, deceased, late a surgeon in the Navy;

The memorial of Henry O. Mayo, surgeon United States Navy, protesting against the passage of the bill making further provisions for widows and heirs of officers of the Navy and for establishing naval life insurance;

A memorial of line officers of the Navy, remonstrating against the passage of an act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy;

A memorial of J. M. Muller, in relation to an improvement in steam engines;

The memorial of William B. Whiting, captain United States Navy, praying that Congress confer upon Rear Admiral Charles Stewart the title of admiral upon the retired list;

The memorial of medical officers of the United States Navy, praying the passage of an act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy;

The memorial of J. H. C. Coffin, professor of mathematics in the United States Navy, &c., praying that his pay may be made equal to that of a captain in the Navy on shore duty;

The memorial of a committee of the American Medical Association, praying the enactment of a law to secure to the members of the medical and surgical staff of the Navy an equal distribution of prize money;

A memorial of American citizens residing in Japan, praying that the conduct of Captain David McDougal, of the United States steamer Wyoming, in the affair with the Japanese ships and batteries at Simonoseki, may be suitably recognized by our Government;

A report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in obedience to law, information in relation to the sale of the vessels Catawba and Oneota;

A letter of David D. Porter, vice admiral United States Navy, in relation to the application of Commander B. B. Taylor for a higher rank in the Navy; and

A letter of James Park, jr., to Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, in relation to the testing of cast-steel for steam boiler purposes.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 74) to promote greater efficiency in the postal service on the Pacific coast, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 956) to establish and declare the railroad and bridges of the New Orleans, Mobile, and Chattanooga Railroad Company, as hereafter constructed, westward from the city of New Orleans, a post road, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) for the relief of James C. Sloo, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the American Colonization Society, praying that the Postmaster General be authorized to contract with that society to carry the mails to Liberia, and that the society be paid $100 for every person of color who shall voluntarily go to Liberia under its auspices, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 45) for the relief of Benjamin F. Small, postmaster at Carson City, State of Nevada, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments:

A bill (S. No. 563) for the preservation of the harbors of the United States against encroachment;

A bill (S. No. 916) to establish lines of American steamships between the United States of America and Europe; and

A bill (S. No. 934) to provide for the improvement of the river, bay, and harbor of Mobile, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred papers relating to the claim of Joshua Hill, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 970) for the relief of Joshua Hill; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1063) for the relief of Henry Barricklow, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, I ask that that bill be passed now. It is one about which there can be no controversy.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me get through with my reports.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

Mr. HOWARD also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the papers in relation to the claim of O. P. Cobb and Christie & Co., reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 237) to refer the claim of O. P. Cobb and others to the Court of Claims; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Miller, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 971) for the relief of Samuel Miller, of Campbell county, Virginia; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. OSBORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 974) granting land to aid in rebuilding the Pensacola and Louisville railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MISS CLARA BARTON'S REPORT.

Mr. GRIMES. On the 10th of March, 1866, Congress appropriated $15,000 for the reimbursement of expenses incurred by Miss Clara Barton in endeavoring to discover missing soldiers of the Army of the United States. I hold in my hand, and ask leave to present to the Senate, a very interesting report made by her, showing how that purpose of Congress has been executed. I move that a thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate. That motion, of course, will go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to that committee, under the rule.

TAXES ON NAVAL MACHINERY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1327.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1327) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with amendments. The amendments were in line five to strike out the word "so;" in line six after the word "thereof" to insert the word "so;" and also to strike out the words "allow to manufacturers of naval machinery for the Government all the benefits conferred by said act upon other manufacturers and" and to insert the word "remit" in lieu thereof; and at the end of the bill to strike out the words "are hereby remitted;" so that the bill, if amended, will read:

That the act to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes, approved March 31, 1868, be, and hereby is, amended in the second section thereof so as to remit all taxes upon such naval machinery which had not accrued prior to the 1st day of April, 1868.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will be necessary, to make the bill grammatical in its phraseology, to strike out the word "such," in the ninth line; and I make that motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear the bill read again as amended. It is short.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend by adding the following, to come in at the end of the bill:

And that the tax heretofore collected on such machinery corresponding to that remitted by this act be, and the same is hereby, remitted.

If this bill is to pass, it is manifest, I think, that those persons who paid the tax on the naval machinery which was used during the war ought to have the benefit of it, if we are to remit the tax in favor of those who have not paid. In fact, the persons who complied with their contracts and delivered their machinery are in a worse condition than those who did not. Those who did not comply are to have the benefit of the remission of the tax upon the machinery imported, while those who fulfilled their agreements and paid up the tax and conformed to the requirements of the contract are not to have the benefit of the act. I hope the amendment I have suggested will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think there is every reason, and very much better reason if this bill is to pass at all, why, as the Senator from Illinois says, those who have already paid on their contracts should have the benefit of the act. I do not think that either of them ought to have it. I know one argument is made in favor of these men that in consequence of the change of system and the lapse of time, &c., labor cost them more. That is their own fault, in a very great measure, simply because they did not perform their contracts. They dragged along for several years with the contracts not performed; and labor and materials became more expensive than they were before. Thus they suffered in consequence of their own delay. The others did not suffer so much because they were prompt in performing their contracts. Now, if any distinction is to be made at all, it should be in favor of those who performed their contracts in time, as the Senator from Illinois suggests. But this matter has been debated once fully in the Senate, and the Senate has decided it; and I do not see any reason why the remission should be made in either case. In fact, the amount is paid by the Government; and there is no escaping from the fact that in the contracts which were made this tax was included, to be paid by the Government; and the Government has paid it, in point of fact, by its addition to the price of the contracts where the contracts have been performed. Where they have not been performed, or were not performed until a late day, the matter stands in precisely the same way, and the parties should not be allowed to avail themselves of their own neglect, and to claim that this amount should be refunded to them by way of making up to them what they lost in the increased value of materials, &c., occasioned by their own laches in not performing their contracts when they should have performed them. That is the way I look at it, and I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose particularly to controvert the correctness of the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois, but this bill, including the amendment which he has proposed, was submitted to the House of Representatives, and that portion of the bill was stricken out and it passed the House, allowing these contractors to have the tax remitted upon all machinery that is not now completed or delivered. In that shape the bill passed the House, and these contractors so far as I know, anticipating that an amendment like that proposed by the Senator from Illinois would wholly defeat the bill, are content to take it as it came from the House. Therefore I hope the bill will not be amended as proposed by the Senator from Illinois, because at this time of course it will inevitably defeat the bill.

The House has decided upon this bill not to refund the tax that has already been paid the Government, but to remit the tax that is not now collected, which is altogether a different thing from that proposed by the Senator from Illinois. It is one thing to pay back taxes that have been collected, and it is another and a different thing to remit taxes that have not yet been collected.

So far as the objection made by the Senator from Maine is concerned, it is evident that if these taxes are remitted these contractors must inevitably suffer loss in the construction of this machinery; and that fact has been demonstrated to the Senate, because on a former occasion there was evidence here to the effect that they had lost forty per cent. upon the contracts which they had made, and the Senate passed a bill for their relief upon the ground that they had sustained loss in consequence of the contracts which they had made for the construction of this machinery.

These contracts were made in 1863, and any one who will refer to the prices of labor and materials subsequent to that time will see that these men must inevitably have lost upon these contracts. For instance, in January, 1863, bar iron was worth ninety-two and a half cents, and in 1864, the next year, it was worth $1 30. There was so much rise upon that particular material. Common iron was worth eighty cents in January, 1863.

Mr. GRIMES. Where do you get that from?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I get it from a statement that is furnished of the different prices at that time, and I suppose there is no question about that. Any man acquainted with the history of this country knows that materials were higher in 1864, wages were higher in 1864, than they were in 1863, and gold was a good deal higher in 1864 than it was in 1863.

Under such circumstances these persons who had contracted to build this machinery and had devoted their establishments to that business could not take custom work and contract according to the prices that might rule at the time the application was made for custom work, but having made these contracts in 1863 they were compelled to go forward and complete them and to pay the increased price for all sorts of materials and for labor, and in that way they sustained losses; and the Senate has decided that they sustained losses in that way.

It is said that these contracts were made with a view to this tax. That is true of all contracts that were made prior to the date when the law was repealed putting tax upon manufactures in this country. Senators advocated here a bill to repeal the tax on manufactures; they struck down millions of taxes at a single blow and relieved the manufacturers of the country; but in this particular case there was an exception made. Now, it is perhaps difficult to ascertain the exact amount to be affected by this act if it passes; but I have an estimate from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which he says that it will not exceed $165,000 that will be remitted to these persons if this bill passes as it has been reported from the committee.

Now, sir, it seems to me that if upon all other manufacturing establishments in this country the taxes could be properly remitted and the revenue of the country in that way deprived of millions upon millions, there ought not, so far as this particular class of persons is concerned, to be such a determination on the part of Congress to compel them to pay this tax simply because they had made contracts with the Government; as though men who were working for the Government were not entitled to the same consideration as men who were working for corporations or private individuals; and the argument amounts to nothing. You cannot pass any general law that will not operate to the advantage of some individuals and to the disadvantage of some other individuals. I presume in 1868, when this law was passed repealing the taxes upon manufactures, there were many persons who were greatly benefited by that act engaged in manufacturing pursuits, and others who were greatly damaged; but it was impossible to pass a general law without producing that effect.

Now, sir, I have examined this case. When the matter was referred to me I confess my prepossessions were against the bill; but after having examined all the documents and papers on the subject it is impossible for me to see why these manufacturers should not stand upon the same footing with other manufacturers in this country; and all the arguments that I have heard made against the repeal of this law apply with equal force to all other manufacturers in the country; and in fact, if there is any favor to be shown by Congress, it seems to me these persons are more entitled to consideration than any other manufacturers, because they made their contracts in 1863, and their efforts from that time forward were devoted to this particular business. If they had made no such contract in 1863 they could have made contracts with customers and fixed their prices according to the prices of labor and material at that time. But they could not do that under these contracts. They had to go on under the contracts of 1863 and pay twenty-five per cent. higher wages than they did in 1863, and also higher prices for all the materials that went into the composition of this machinery. I hope this bill will pass. I think it is right and just; and for that reason I have recommended its adoption by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, this seems to be the perfect paradise of Government contractors. If they make a bargain by which they make large profits of course they do not refund anything to the Government, but if they make a bad bargain they come to Congress for relief. The Senator from Oregon argues that these parties ought to have relief upon a contract which they took with the understanding that they were to pay the tax; and yet when we repealed the tax from all other persons, which benefited them, of course, and of which they had no right to complain, because it enabled them to produce their own manufactures at a cheaper rate, they come here and ask relief on this special contract.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator from Vermont to suspend his remarks until the committees can further report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are out of order. When the Senate unanimously consent to take up a bill it cannot be interrupted by reports, or no business will be done.

Mr. POMEROY. If this bill is to be debated during the whole morning hour I think we had better lay it on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not propose to debate it for any length of time.

Mr. POMEROY. We want to do some business in the morning hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the Senator has some particular business of his own that he wants to have done.

Mr. POMEROY. Not a thing more than any other Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know why this bill is not entitled to as much consideration as any other business.

Mr. POMEROY. We usually devote the morning hour to morning business and such bills as do not occupy time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I gave way for reports and everything that anybody wanted to put in.

Mr. CRAGIN. I rise to a question of order. When the regular order has been gone through with, the presentation of petitions, reports of committees, introduction of bills and joint resolutions, and resolutions, and a motion is made to take up a bill, I contend that it is not then in order for any Senator to rise here and ask as a privilege in the morning hour to introduce a petition or make a report from a committee. The time for those things has already passed.

Mr. POMEROY. Any Senator has a right to move to lay this bill on the table, I suppose.

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. These parties made contracts in 1863, and the whole of them, fourteen or fifteen in number, were to be completed in 1864. They will not consent now that the Government shall abandon their contracts, but claim that the Government shall fulfill them; and they want at this late hour to deliver their machinery according to the contracts, and yet to have this deduction of the five-per-cent. interest tax. The Senator from Oregon claims that these parties had to pay a much higher rate for iron in 1864 than was the price in 1863, and yet the fact is, not one of them completed his contract in 1864 nor in 1865. At least three years, as I am informed, elapsed before any one of them was completed; so that they had the advantage of the fall in prices in 1865. I do not know that they were quite as low as they were in 1863, but whether they were or not they took the contracts with their eyes open. I have a list of them here. There are eleven or twelve of them of $400,000 apiece, all to be completed in 1864 save one, which was to be completed in 1865. There is another of $700,000, to be completed September 24, 1864; another of $680,000, July 24, 1864; another of $700,000, October 26, 1864; and altogether they amount to nearly or $8,000,000. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois certainly has as much justice in it as any of these claims. Why should this tax be refunded to these parties? Simply because the Government is going to use the machinery, I suppose; but in this case the Government does not want this machinery, cannot use it if it has it, and yet they want to be paid for it according to the contracts. I trust, sir, we shall not set the precedent by passing a bill of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, although on principle I should like to support it. It would be a burden on this bill which would probably defeat it. I wish to say, in reply to the Senator from Vermont, that I sympathize with the policy of this Government that would not allow the contractors for the iron-clads to be broken up, because they invested their money in a great enterprise for the good of the Government. I do not know these particular contractors, but I had some connection with the bill for the relief of a class of them, and it is my judgment that Congress has not done them half the justice that ought to have been done them. In one case a man was in the prisons in Boston under the insolvent laws, because of debts that were contracted in building one of the vessels that fought the battles of the country during the war. I do not believe in this thing of saving money for the great body of the people by breaking up men who have done great service to the people. When the Senator last year favored the abolishment of taxes upon manufactures I do not see why men who manufactured for the Government should have been excluded from the benefit of that act. If a manufacturer of machinery had contracted with me, then the Senator's policy would have been to relieve him from tax upon it; but if he had contracted with the Government for the very same machinery the Senator would be in favor of keeping the tax upon him. Why? Upon that presumption that a man gets a better contract from the Government. If he goes upon that presumption, as a matter of fact, the presumption is not true. The men who during the war manufactured machinery for private individuals made fortunes, made money all the way through, while the men who made contracts with the Government in the year 1863, and had to do the work in 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1866, were all of them to a greater or less extent injured in their fortunes. This, in my judgment, is a strong case for relief, and I support it cheerfully.

Mr. GRIMES. These are not the iron-clad contractors. There are very few of the people that made iron-clad vessels who are interested in this subject. These are engine contractors in various parts of the United States. I think the Senator from Oregon is slightly mistaken when he says that they were not able to do any work outside of the work they were employed in in consequence of these contracts. I am somewhat familiar with this subject. The truth is that during the whole time of the war the men who were engaged in fulfilling contracts with the Government for building iron-clads and engines, while they were bound up strictly to their contracts, which none of them fulfilled, were yet limited in the amount of those contracts; and when our steamers needed repairs we were compelled to send them to their shops and their yards, and the result was that they fixed their own prices and most of them exorbitant prices; and when it was proposed to establish a yard at a proper place with shops and machinery, where we could have had our own repairs and made our own ships, they gathered around Congress and interposed all sorts of obstacles to the establishing of that place and the carrying out of that programme.

Now, what is the condition of this case? I ask the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the statement I am about to make. In 1863 the Secretary of the Navy made certain contracts for machinery, all of which were to be completed in the autumn of 1864 before the close of the war. Some of these contracts were completed in proper time. The men who made those contracts and completed them have paid their tax. They were honest, conscientious men, and fulfilled their obligations to the Government. These other men who made contracts at the same time for the same sort of machinery did not complete their contracts until 1868, and now they come to Congress and ask that we relieve them from the payment of the tax which the men who have conscientiously filled their contracts have already paid; and you say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois shall not be adopted to refund the amount of taxes that have been paid by the contractors who have honestly and conscientiously fulfilled their contracts. You will not put them upon the same level and in the same condition. You will not, in other words, do as well by them as you will by the man who has been five years negligent in the performance of his contract. That is what you will say when you reject the proposition of the Senator from Illinois.

On one side are parties who fulfilled their contracts according to the stipulations of them, and on the other parties who did not fulfill theirs until between three and four years afterward, and you propose to relieve those who were negligent in their duty and were so far remiss and you will not relieve those who fulfilled their contracts conscientiously and promptly.

Now, it is said that the Navy Department did not want these vessels because of the close of the war; but I say, in reply to that, that the Navy Department did want the vessels, and never expressed any opinion to the contrary until long after the time had elapsed when the contracts were to be completed; but the war terminating in 1865, months after the contracts were to have been completed, of course they did not care anything about engines they had no use for; but the contractors ought not to take advantage of their own wrong in that particular. That ought not to be urged as an argument in behalf of their bill. If we are going to do justice let us include all the contractors; those who faithfully performed their contracts certainly as soon as those who were three years behind time.

Mr. DIXON. Allow me to ask whether in many instances those parties were not the same persons? The Senator makes a distinction between those who fulfilled and those who did not fulfill their contracts. Were they not the same identical parties?

Mr. GRIMES. In some instances they were and in some they were not.

Mr. DIXON. Were they not the same in a large majority of cases?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; but it does not make any difference if they were a majority. If there was a single man who was not included it would make all the difference in the world in this proposition, because that one man having fulfilled his contract to furnish one engine, he ought not to be called upon to pay tax which another person who did not fulfill his contract is exempt from paying.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, it will be recollected by every Senator that in March last Congress passed an act relieving manufacturers from the tax which had been imposed upon them, with the exception of the manufacturers of naval machinery. Now, what is sought to be accomplished by this bill is that the manufacturers then excepted shall have remitted to them the taxes which have been imposed upon them since the passage of that law; in other words, to make that law to include all manufacturers and all manufactures. The Senator from Illinois offers an amendment to this bill, going back to the date of the passage of the law in 1868, for the purpose of refunding to these contractors money which they had paid before. The men involved in this bill paid their taxes, whatever they were, prior to March, 1868, the same as all other manufacturers, and all that they ask now is that the tax which has accrued since the passage of that law may be remitted, so that there may be no exception whatever. If we are to go back to refund taxes to one class of manufacturers prior to the passage of the law of March, 1868, then we shall be called upon to go back and refund taxes to other classes of manufacturers. Why should not the manufacturers of iron and other products come in here and ask to have their taxes refunded? This bill seeks, and only that, to place all manufacturers upon the same ground from March, 1868, and not to go back at all.

For one I agree entirely with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] that these manufacturers of naval machinery and of iron-clads, &c., as a general rule deserve the consideration of Congress—deserve relief. But all that this bill seeks to do is to put all manufacturers upon an equality from the day we passed the act in March last.

Now, it is said by the Senator from Iowa that these other contractors who had completed their contracts and delivered their machinery prior to that time had complied with the contracts. He must be aware that nearly every one of them furnished that machinery after the time specified in the contracts.

Mr. GRIMES. They paid tax on it.

Mr. CRAGIN. So did the persons intended to be benefited by this bill pay their tax up to March, 1868, the same as all others, so far as they had gone.

Mr. GRIMES. They did not pay anything.

Mr. CRAGIN. "Actually paid" is the expression. I suppose it is not all paid at once. They pay as the work progresses on the portion finished.

Mr. GRIMES. Not until it is all done.

Mr. CRAGIN. At any rate I fail to see any reason why these manufacturers should not have the same benefits with all others from the time the law of March, 1868, was passed. That is all that this bill asks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon or the chairman of the Committee on Finance what amount is involved in this bill; how much the tax which the bill proposes to remit amounts to, and how much is involved in the amendment which provides for the refunding of taxes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a statement from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in which he estimates that about one hundred and sixty thousand dollars of tax will be remitted by the passage of this bill; but as to the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois I am not able to make any specific answer, as I have not obtained any estimate; but I presume the amount would be doubled at any rate if that amendment were adopted. I presume the Government would be compelled to refund an amount equal to the amount remitted by the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want to state exactly what this question is, so that if anybody does not understand it he may understand it as I do, if I am able to state it. We agreed to pay these manufacturers so much money for so much work. Into that price went the amount of Government tax; that made a part of the price. They did not perform their contracts. Others did and received their price. These men did not; I do not know that they have done it to this day; and now they come and ask us to increase the price to them by paying them the amount of the tax. They already receive it as a part of the price in the first place, and now they ask us to add just so much more—because that is the effect of it—to the price because they did not perform their contracts.

Mr. HOWARD. Is this bill so drawn as to cover cases where the work has not been performed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It covers nothing but those where the work was not performed according to the contract or for two or three years afterward, if it has been at all; and they put it upon the ground that we ought to do it, that is, increase the price by just adding the Government tax which we have already paid them or are to pay them, it being included in the price, by adding that same amount again, because in consequence of their not performing their contracts the material cost them more. That is the question, and the only question there is before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, to assume that the argument of the Senator from Maine is correct in this case is to assume that the bill as it was originally passed, repealing all taxes on manufactures, was an erroneous and improper bill to pass. All that this bill proposes to do is to put a certain class of manufacturers upon the same footing with all the other manufacturers, and not to proscribe men because they happened to be contractors under the Government while the beneficiaries of your law are extended to other manufacturers.

In 1868, when these taxes were remitted, no doubt there were millions of dollars of manufactures contracted for in this country, and the contracts were made with reference to the tax existing at the time the parties entered into the contracts; but when the property was delivered under those contracts this law had been passed, and the taxes were remitted and they received the benefit of the law. Now, it is simply proposed to put these manufacturers upon the same footing. Why should Congress in its legislation select a certain class of persons and say because they make contracts with the Government they shall not enjoy the same advantages that other parties had under the legislation of Congress?

Now, sir, it is an incontrovertible fact that these people did lose money upon these contracts. Gold in 1863 was worth considerably less than it was in 1864, within the time when this machinery was to be delivered, and materials increased greatly in value, and these people were compelled to pay those high prices for their materials.

Mr. GRIMES. Allow me to suggest that these contracts, while they were made in 1863, when gold was high, were not completed until 1868, when gold was quite low and labor was very much depressed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No matter about that.

Mr. GRIMES. But the other parties whom the Senator from Illinois seeks to benefit completed their contracts in 1864, according to the stipulations of the contracts, when gold and labor were both high, and the Senator objects to refunding money to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to it because I know that it will defeat the bill; for that reason and not because the principle is not correct. But is it true that because we are unable to do justice to everybody we shall therefore do justice to nobody? If it be true that these men are entitled to this relief they ought to have it; and it is no argument against this bill to say that you cannot relieve everybody. If it was possible to make the operation of this law equal upon every individual and under all circumstances, then, of course, the law would be so framed; but the law ought to stand now as it ought to have stood when it was passed, and instead of proscribing any particular class of manufacturers it should have included all manufacturers; it should have provided that all manufacturers are exempt from tax from and after the date of the passage of that law.

Now, sir, it is objected here that these people did not fulfill their contracts. The Government can take advantage of that in any way they see proper. That does not concern the question whether or not they ought to pay their taxes. If the Government is willing to receive their work at this time, and if the Government has acquiesced in their failure to perform the contracts within the time specified, then it does not lie in the mouth of Congress to object to putting these men upon the same footing with all other manufacturers. I doubt very much whether any of this machinery was delivered within the contract time. Unless I am greatly misinformed none of it was; but on account of the high prices and on account of the difficulty of procuring labor it was impossible for these men to complete the contracts within the time fixed, and so the time was extended; but soon after the necessity for this machinery ceased, and the Government, as I understand, has fully acquiesced in this extension of time; and therefore there is no occasion, it seems to me, because all the persons who paid taxes cannot be relieved, that those should not be who are embraced in this provision.

Mr. SPRAGUE. If you compel these people to pay their taxes now you compel them to pay a very large amount more than if they had paid their taxes as other manufacturers pay. The Senate should, in my judgment, look at it in the light of a contract having been made in 1863 on the basis of a certain price, and when the delivery and payment are made the Government pays less than it contracted to pay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe that the Government itself pays the tax by the contract, because it is included in the price.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It does not make any difference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. A single word further. The Senator from New Jersey inquired as to the amount this bill will take out of the Treasury. I suppose it is wholly impossible to make an accurate estimate either by the Commissioner or any one else. Last year, when the proposition was before Congress, the Special Commissioner of the Revenue estimated it at $600,000. I believe in the Committee on Finance the estimates of the members differed very widely, some thinking it would amount to four or five hundred thousand dollars, and some not so high as the amount estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the Senator does not wish to be understood that this bill in its present shape, without the amendment, would involve that amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know what effect the amendment that has been made would have. It does not limit it as to time. It uses the word "remit" instead of "allow." I do not think that would change it very much. The amount that would be included by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is wholly uncomestable. The expenditure for machinery since the commencement of the war amounts to millions upon millions. This very bill contemplates the remission of taxes upon from eight to twelve million dollars. I suppose we have expended hundreds of millions of dollars for machinery, on which we shall be compelled to refund taxes if the bill should pass.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator say that the money refunded would amount to several millions?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. You said something about "eight millions."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This bill contemplates refunding the tax upon about eight millions.

Mr. CATTELL. That is the percentage on eight millions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it is only about one hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for a division on that question. It seems to me if we are to pass the bill the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add the following words:

And that the tax heretofore collected upon such machinery corresponding to that remitted by this act be, and the same is hereby, refunded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does seem to me that Senators cannot understand this amendment, or they would not object to it. In 1863 certain parties entered into contracts with the Government of the United States to construct naval vessels and naval machinery. No tax was then imposed on the machinery.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; there was a tax of three per cent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There was three per cent. at that time, it seems. A portion of these contractors have been relieved by the Government. The price of constructing vessels was so increased by the increased price of labor and material that the parties were unable to comply with their contracts, and the Government has relieved some few of them. I happen to know of a case of a party who constructed one of these vessels for the western waters who never had any relief, and who completed his contract and paid his tax and has been ruined by the contract. Now, there is a proposition here, to do what? To remit the tax upon this machinery in favor of parties who made contracts at the same time that they did, and who have not yet paid the tax. Because they were dilatory, and because the tax was not collected from them at the time when it should have been, they come in here and ask to have it remitted. Now, I propose that the man who completed his contract and who paid his tax in pursuance of his agreement shall not be put in a worse position than the man who failed to comply with his contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make one answer to that argument, and it is this: the law was passed in 1863 to be prospective in its operation and not retrospective, and all persons who had prior to that date paid their tax had to suffer that loss if there was any loss.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not those who are liable to pay it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because that law was intended to operate prospectively and to remit all taxes that had not been paid up to that time upon all sorts of manufactures in the country, and this is simply to put this class of persons on the same footing with all other classes and not to give them any special advantages; but to undertake to go back prior to that date and remit taxes paid would be to give them advantages over other manufacturers in the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The answer to that was made before when this matter was debated, and it is this: that with regard to contracts between individuals there was no mode in which we could reach it. We abolished the tax from a certain time, and we could not, by any machinery that we could use, change that matter. It must stand as it did. But with regard to contracts made with the Government, inasmuch as the Government itself paid the tax, we could reach and lay our hands upon them.

Mr. CORBETT. I suppose if there had been any exception at the time this law was passed the Senator from Illinois would not have offered this amendment; but as an exception was made of those articles that were contracted for by the Government at that time, and it is proposed now to remit those taxes, he proposes to offer this amendment to the bill. As I understand, the object of this bill is to place these manufacturers on the same level with other manufacturers. There were merchants who purchased goods of manufacturers to be delivered in thirty, sixty, and ninety days after the expiration of this tax who could come back with the same reason and ask the manufacturer to return the tax or relinquish the tax to them as that we should relinquish it to the manufacturer; but there is no discrimination made in that way. Consequently, every one who purchased goods of the manufacturer had to pay the manufacturer those taxes. You have struck a line; you have said that after a certain day these manufacturers should not be taxed. Now it is proposed to put these manufacturers on the same ground with every other manufacturer; and when you go beyond that it seems to me you are at sea, and you do not know how many will come in and ask for taxes to be remitted to them. It seems to me that this proposition of the Committee on Finance, placing these manufacturers upon the same level with other manufacturers, is no more than right. They will have the same advantage as any private manufacturers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, on which he asks for a division.

The amendment was rejected—ayes ten, yeas not counted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. I want to put myself on the record against it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Ferry, Hendricks, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sprague, Sumner, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Welch, and Williams—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, McGreevy, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Tipton, Van Winkle, and Willey—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Edmunds, Fowler, Henderson, Norton, Osborn, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Whyte, Wilson, and Yates—15.

So the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 1741) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to have that bill laid aside informally for a moment, in order to take up a resolution which was reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad some time ago, entitled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 202) more effectually to secure the faithful completion of the Union Pacific railroad and its branches according to law. I endeavored some time ago to get this resolution up, and have it considered and passed by the Senate; and I hope the Senator who has charge of the unfinished business will give his consent to lay it aside for a moment in order to take up this joint resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask what is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is a pension bill granting a pension to Emily B. Bidwell and others.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that that bill be postponed in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday prior to the recess, the Army appropriation bill, if the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will give his consent.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I make that motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the unfinished business will be laid aside.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw his motion for a short time. I think we can get a vote on this pension bill in a few minutes. It is a bill that passed Congress at the last session; but owing to some inadvertence inconsistent provisions were put in it so that it could not be executed at the Department, and I think the question can be settled in a very few minutes.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator had better allow that to go over. We can get it up at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the Army appropriation bill. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the pending order be laid aside informally with a view to take up the joint resolution which I have mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent. The Senator from Michigan asks that the pending bill be laid aside informally. Is there any objection?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to know what bill the Senator from Michigan proposes to take up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A bill in relation to a railroad.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; it is the joint resolution reported by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad more effectually to secure the faithful completion of the Union Pacific railroad and its branches according to law. I do not think it will lead to much debate, perhaps none. It is a measure eminently deserving to be passed, in my judgment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hardly think the Senator from Michigan would appeal to me to have the Army bill, which is now nearly completed, postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to postponing it informally?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the permission of the Senator from Maine to make a couple of reports.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive reports of committees at this time if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of members of the Senate and House of Representatives from the southern States, praying the passage of the bill to pay loyal citizens in the States lately in rebellion for services rendered in taking the United States census in 1860, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James St. John, praying an appropriation for the payment of the reward offered for the capture of Jefferson Davis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Stuart Barnes, reported a bill (S. No. 972) for the benefit of Stuart Barnes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported a bill (S. No. 973) to establish certain post roads; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 309) to promote the efficiency of the Indian department, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. VICKERS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 834) to incorporate the Southern Express Company, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

CAIRO AND FULTON RAILROAD.

Mr. RICE. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred the petition of the Cairo and Fulton Railroad Company, asking for an extension of time for the completion of the first twenty miles of their road, have instructed me to report a joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad; and with the consent of the Senator from Maine I ask that the present order be laid aside temporarily with a view of passing this resolution at once. There is no objection to it in any quarter.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read three times, and passed. It provides that in case the Cairo and Fulton Railroad Company shall complete the first section of twenty miles of its road by the 28th of April, 1870, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied of such completion, the company shall be entitled to its lands in all respects and to the same extent as it would have been had the twenty miles been completed by the 28th of July, 1869, as provided by the law relating to the railroad company, approved July 28, 1866.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion by Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That J. T. Wright have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Commodore Mitchell have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

ORDNANCE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution for the printing of the report of the joint Committee on Ordnance relative to experiments upon heavy ordnance, with accompanying documents, report it back and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the joint Committee on Ordnance relative to experiments upon heavy ordnance, with the accompanying documents and illustrations, be printed; and that two thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to know how much this will cost.

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing of the usual number, which I suppose is a matter of course, will cost $1,300. The additional two thousand copies will cost $400. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Ordnance in his seat, but it is the judgment of the committee that the report ought to be printed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This subject of ordnance is not one of general interest in the country, and I think it is unnecessary to print the two thousand additional copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing, which I suppose is a matter of course, will cost $1,300. The additional two thousand copies which the Committee on Ordnance have asked for will cost $400.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This is hardly a book for popular distribution.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; but there is an immense amount of information in it of great value to that branch of the public service, as the committee informs me.

The resolution was agreed to.

REVISION OF RULES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed to report any modification or change of the rules of the Senate which may be deemed necessary for the proper action of the Senate in conducting the public business.

I wish to state that there is no disposition to make a general revision of the rules, but there is one respect in which I think they are defective, and I know the Chair agrees with me; and there is one respect in which I think they contravene the Constitution of the United States, and I am fearful that if we do not alter the rules somebody will move to alter the Constitution, as that seems to be the favorite remedy for any trouble.

Mr. BUCKALEW. While we are establishing a committee to revise the rules, I suggest that we had better extend their authority to the joint rules.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that if it does not require a joint resolution.

Mr. BUCKALEW. For instance we have a joint rule with regard to the counting of the electoral votes, which requires very careful attention.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would not that require a concurrent resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair thinks this committee can be charged with all that relates to the action of the Senate on the subject. Of course any recommendation of the committee in regard to the joint rules would require joint action, but the committee need not necessarily be a joint committee in its appointment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to amend by extending the authority of the committee to the joint rules. The Clerk will put it in form.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to say that while the committee are occupied with this subject I hope they will not forget to abolish the old and barbarous system of enrolling our bills on parchment, which is an additional expense and takes time unnecessarily. It has come down from distant ages, and I believe that the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts and the Congress of the United States are the only legislative bodies where it is preserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution, as modified, extends to the rules of the Senate and the joint rules of the two Houses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It strikes me as very inappropriate to appoint a committee of the Senate to revise the joint rules. Certainly it had better be a joint committee for that purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. We do not refer any other bills to a joint committee. We refer a bill that requires the assent of both Houses and of the President of the United States to the committees of the two Houses separately. I do not see the necessity of its being a joint committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But this is in regard to the transaction of business in the two Houses, and a joint rule, it would seem to me, ought not to be considered in that way. It would be better to have a joint committee for that purpose. I have no objection to a joint committee or to a committee of the Senate. It is true there is nothing unparliamentary in it. I apprehend we may appoint a committee to consider the revision of the joint rules; but it would strike me as a singular mode of proceeding, and one not likely to attain its ends. To accomplish anything it would be much better to have associated with this committee a committee of the House of Representatives, and then when the report was made it would be understood in both Houses, and be much more likely to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on adopting the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. When this bill was under consideration yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] moved an amendment providing for the payment of a certain claim of the States of Massachusetts and Maine. To the reception of that amendment the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] interposed a question of order. That question of order was submitted to the Senate under the sixth rule, and the Senate is to decide whether the amendment is admissible under the thirtieth rule. The question now before the Senate is whether under the provisions of the thirtieth rule this amendment is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. As this question has come over from yesterday, I hope the Senate will pardon me if I remind them of the point on which they are to decide. It is whether the claim of a State is a private claim or a public claim under the rule of the Senate. Now, sir, I submit to the Senate, what is a public claim if the claim of a State be not one? To what claim will you apply the words of the rule? I insist that the claim of a State is public in contradistinction to private, and that there is nothing in the circumstances of this claim to take it out of the general rule. It is public, according to the reason of the case. It is public also according to the precedents of this body. I reminded you yesterday of eighteen since 1854 that have found their way on the statute-book. Shall I cite them again? Shall I take more time to press them upon the Senate? There they are, precisely applicable to this case. If you decide now that the claim of Massachusetts is not a public claim you practically declare that all the legislation of the country since 1854, containing no less than eighteen such claims on appropriation bills, was contrary to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question about those eighteen precedents?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Are they, any of them, cases like this, in which the point of order was made and adjudicated in the direction that he argues?

Mr. SUMNER. I will answer the Senator; they are cases precisely like this.

Mr. CONKLING. But was the point of order made?

Mr. SUMNER. I will come to the point. They are cases precisely like this. Whether the point of order was made on the presentation of the claim I have no means of knowing. Suffice it to say, they find their place in Army appropriation bills. What more can be needed? If they were out of order they could not be there. The fact that they are on the Army bills is the answer to the question of the Senator. Now, let me call attention to the provisions in the cases of Maryland and Massachusetts, which are identical, so much so that, as lawyers would say, the two cases go on all fours. The last appropriation for the principal of the claim of Massachusetts was made in the act of 1859, in these words:

"That for the purpose of executing a resolution approved May 14, 1836, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $227,176 48, reported under said resolution to be due to said State by J. B. Poinsett, late Secretary of War, in a report dated the 23d December, 1837."

You will observe this is in 1859, and the report was in 1837—

"made to the House of Representatives the 27th of December, 1837: Provided, That in lieu of payment in money, the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, issue to said State United States stock bearing an interest of five per cent. per annum, and redeemable at the end of ten years or sooner, at the pleasure of the President."

Mr. CONKLING. There is no provision there for the interest.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no provision here for the interest, and it is for that very reason that I make the present motion; but observe, there is a provision to pay a claim according to a report bearing date 1837. Of course from 1837 to 1859 interest had been accumulating. Massachusetts part of that time at home was paying interest on her obligations, and according to the rule adopted at the Treasury Department she is entitled to interest on that claim.

Now, observe, sir, that this very claim was put on the Army appropriation bill in 1859—the claim for the principal. Now I come to the question of interest, and here I ask the attention of the Senate to the Maryland case, which will be found on the civil appropriation bill of March 3, 1857, as follows:

"That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to reexamine the account between the United States and the State of Maryland, as the same was from time to time adjusted under the act passed on the 13th May, 1826, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland,' and on such reexamination to assume the sums expended by the State of Maryland for the use and benefit of the United States, and the sums refunded and repaid by the United States to the said State, and the times of such payments as being correctly stated in the account as the same has heretofore been passed at the Treasury Department; but in the calculation of interest due under the act aforesaid the following rules shall be observed, to wit, interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and if it exceed the interest due, the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal; if the payment fall short of the interest, the balance of interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest. Second, interest shall be allowed the State of Maryland on such sums only on which the said State either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund."

Now, sir, you will observe that here is an appropriation to pay interest to the State of Maryland for advances in the war of 1812, and that this appropriation appears on a general appropriation bill. The question on which we are to vote is one of order, and I ask your attention to this precedent as absolutely decisive of the question of order. It was the case of a State, and a claim for interest, and that claim was recognized on a general appropriation bill. How much further can you go? What further precedent is needed? You cannot vote the claim for Massachusetts' interest out of order without practically declaring that when this appropriation was put on an appropriation bill in 1857 it was in defiance of the rules of the Senate.

I began what I had to say by remarking that this was entirely in harmony with reason. Let me remind Senators, what we all habitually notice here, that resolutions from a State or any communications from a State have a peculiar precedence and preëminence in this body. They are always read at length, and they are printed as a matter of course according to the rules of the Senate. Such is the distinction accorded by our rules to a State. And now, sir, how vain it is to accord such a distinction in form if you refuse the distinction in substance. A State here has a claim; and shall you say, in order to exclude it from this bill, that it is private in character, when, according to the reason of the case, it is public, and according to the precedents of the body it is public?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the question presented as a question of order becomes exceedingly important in view of the consequences of opening the door to the admission of this class of claims on appropriation bills. The Senator from Massachusetts attempts to show that this is not a private claim by showing that claims of States have been paid upon Army and other appropriation bills. I could show more than a hundred cases where private claims of individuals for past debts have been put on appropriation bills; but that does not reverse the rule, nor enable him to violate the rule when the point of order is directly made. There are innumerable cases where private bills which he himself would admit to be private bills have been put on the appropriation bills; in some cases in violation of the rule by a majority overriding the rule; in some cases without objection; in other cases by committees of conference where there have been disagreements between the two Houses. A multitude of precedents might be shown, but that does not prove the point. The question is whether this amendment is to provide for a private claim; in other words, whether it is a private bill.

The distinction between a public and private bill is somewhat difficult to draw; but I must say that if this is not a private bill no private bill has ever been offered in the Senate Chamber. Mr. Barclay, at page 151 of his Digest, says:

"The line of distinction between public and private bills is so difficult to be defined in many cases that it must rest on the opinion of the Speaker and the details of the bill. It has been the practice in Parliament, and also in Congress, to consider as private such as are for the interest of individuals, public companies, or corporations, a parish, city, county, or other locality. To be a private bill it must not be general in its enactments, or for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons."

That is the very case here. Here is a private claim for the benefit of a railroad corporation. It is shown by the official records of this Congress that the only ownership of this claim, equitable and legal, is in a corporation. The claim once belonged to the State of Massachusetts, which afterward transferred a portion of it to the State of Maine; and then the whole of it was transferred by both States for the benefit of a railroad corporation. It is for an alleged past due debt, not for a future expenditure; not to carry into execution an existing law. It is not pretended that any law justifies the payment of this money, but a law is sought to get the money from the Treasury of the United States. If we intend to abide by our rule this is clearly the case of a private claim due to a private corporation, money past due, and the reason and spirit of the rule exclude it from the appropriation bill.

There is no distinction whether the money is due to a State or to a corporation or to an individual. It is not a general bill, because it does not relate generally to all persons in like condition. If the State of Connecticut has such a claim, it would not be covered by this proposition, because this is confined to the claims of Massachusetts and Maine. It is local in its character, individual in its character, confined to the interests of a few, and not for the general interest of the whole people of the United States. It is undoubtedly the rule that this is a private claim; and I warn Senators that if we enter into the discussion of this claim, amounting, according to my computation, to over a million dollars, we shall open a wide and general field of debate that I do not wish to enter upon. It is only one of four claims that have been transferred to this railroad company, the aggregate of which is in the neighborhood of $3,000,000. It was stated by one of their agents in 1864 at $2,300,000, and with the accruing interest it must now amount to $3,000,000. It is a claim for interest not according to or in the modes that interest was allowed to the State of Maryland, because the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is so framed as to extend it far beyond any precedent and to pay out of the Treasury of the United States the interest on a claim fifty-three years old. It is the very principle of the Galphin claim, which almost destroyed an administration, where they attempted to pay interest on a private claim extending back to the period of the Revolution.

Here is a claim which from time to time has been allowed and paid off, and now it is proposed to pay the interest on it back to its origin. This principle, if adopted and applied to all claims, would swamp this Government and all the Governments in Christendom. Here was a claim of Massachusetts of over eight hundred thousand dollars which has been paid in full to the last dollar in various installments; first, a certain amount was allowed and paid, and next another amount, and finally, on a report made by Mr. Poinsett, a report which does not show whether the last sums paid were for principal or interest, the whole balance of the claim of Massachusetts, every dollar claimed by Massachusetts in 1837, amounting to $227,000, was subsequently paid, and the whole account was squared.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me remind the Senator that according to this very text—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to remind Senators that on the question of order the merits of the amendment are not to be debated.

Mr. SUMNER. According to the act of 1859 the amount was to be paid precisely according to the report of 1837, without any additional interest. That is the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. The payment in 1859 was in full of the claim according to the report of the Secretary of War of 1837. If there was any interest due it was due then. No claim for it appears to have been made; and here we have the official documents showing that no claim had been made by Massachusetts for the interest during all this long course of negotiation.

Now, sir, it is wise, upon an appropriation bill at the heel of the session, to embark in the enterprise of paying interest on claims that accrued in the war of 1812, when the interest is now far greater than the principal? If this principle was extended to private parties as well as to States the Senators who propose it would themselves see the effect and the consequences to which it would lead. I have no objection to applying to Massachusetts the same rule that has been applied to other States; but if the Senator who offers the amendment will look into the subject carefully he will find that the claim of Massachusetts does not rest upon the same circumstances as the claim of Maryland. The peculiar equity and merit of the claim of Maryland was the fact that the State of Maryland had used trust funds, which were bearing interest, and had applied them to the payment of certain expenses during the war of 1812. This was made the ground of a special claim, and that claim was allowed and paid before the payment of the last installment to Massachusetts; and although Maryland had been paid and settled with, and the interest had been allowed here, as an exceptional claim, before Massachusetts was finally settled with, Massachusetts made no claim for the interest, because her claim did not rest upon the same circumstances and the same facts that induced the allowance of interest to the State of Maryland. Trust funds of Maryland had been diverted from their use; those funds bore interest and they were applied by the State; and this is the explanation of the last clause of the Maryland appropriation act declaring that no such interest should be paid except upon certain interest-bearing funds, which had been applied by the State.

I think it is wiser for the Senate to adhere to a rule which is founded in the strongest possible reason, and that is that at the close of the session our appropriation bills should not be incumbered with private claims not resting upon existing law or upon treaty stipulation for the benefit of States or individuals, but should be confined to what they purport to be, appropriations for the future expenses of the Government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, yesterday my colleague expressed himself very decidedly that a claim due to a State of necessity was a public claim. I do not purpose to question that; he may be right that the obligation to a State, like an obligation to a foreign Government, may be of such public character as that it does not within our rules come within the description of a private claim. But when the State has sold that claim to a private corporation, and it is pressed by that corporation, then, I think, it is clearly a private claim. It is no longer due the State; it is then due to private persons. This claim comes here, an old one, under very dignified management. It comes not from the Committee on Claims, who ordinarily investigate the obligations of the Government here, but it comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations, as I understand; and I suppose that is upon the ground that there are foreign relations between this Government and the States of Massachusetts and Maine. That is carrying the doctrine of State rights rather further than I am disposed to go.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain to the Senator why it came from the Foreign Relations Committee. This is only one of four claims. Among the claims is a large claim of I think one or two millions for cutting down some timber in the State of Maine, a claim which it is alleged grows out of the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That has no connection whatever with this.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that gave the Committee on Foreign Relations jurisdiction of the subject, matter of the claim, and I presume that explains why it came from that committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As they have no connection, I am not able to see how the one carried the other there. But it comes with the indorsement of the Committee on Foreign Relations, upon which committee are the able Senators from these two States. I think the claim ought to share the fortunes of all other claims that come here and go to the committee that ordinarily investigates such matters. The Committee on Claims in this body, as I understand, persistently refuses to pay interest; and that has become almost the policy of the Government.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will the Senator allow me to explain how it happens to come from this committee?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall be very happy to hear it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Maine and Massachusetts had four claims on the Government; they were put together in a single bill. Two of those claims came up under the treaty of Washington of 1842; and hence the whole bill, including the four claims, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, inasmuch as two of them properly and almost necessarily belonged to that committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Have not some of those been disposed of?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. One simply.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That rested on a treaty.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Yes, sir; it was for lands given up under the treaty of Washington in 1842.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire. He is also on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and a near neighbor of the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine. It is very satisfactory to find that there is such harmony in that immediate neighborhood for paying upon a principle that we do not allow in regard to any other claim that is presented against the Government of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Allow me once more. I will say that one motive with the Senator from New Hampshire was this: New Hampshire has received pay on precisely the same principle that is established in this amendment and now she wants to do justice to her neighbors in Massachusetts and Maine, having no State interest or personal interest in the matter whatever.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If one of the neighborhood has got that allowance which is denied to every other part of the country I think we had better stop it; the thing has gone about far enough. This claim has been paid. As is shown by the Senator from Ohio the balance of the claim has been paid, and then the States assigned interest upon that to a corporation and that corporation beseeches Congress for its allowance. I do not believe in that. I do not think States ought to assign claims against the General Government to private corporations speculating in these claims—claims that are entirely speculative, claims for interest after the principal has all been paid. Then, when such parties come here and present them, they should be regarded as private parties presenting a private claim and take the fortunes of every other claim. Thousands of persons have claims meritorious and not meritorious, it may be, depending before the Committees on Claims that cannot be considered; and they are not allowed under the rules of the Senate to present their claims upon the general appropriation bills, and it is regarded as a wholesome rule. Then, why ought it not to be applied to the railroad company that urges this speculative claim here against the Government of the United States?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely wish to enter my protest against the fling of gentlemen on this question of order—this talk about a private corporation. That does not affect the question of order at all, in my judgment, because Senators will see that the State of Massachusetts has been prosecuting this claim for years, and it is only since the prosecution of it began in this body that the interest in it has been assigned to this railroad company. Does that change the nature of the claim?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Maine if the State of Maine did not receive the last payment as the balance of the claim, as stated by the Secretary of War?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not disputing that. They received the balance of the principal of the original claim; but I say they have been prosecuting this claim for interest for years before the assignment was made to this corporation; but the Senator states it as if this was an original claim by a company. It is not so in any sense of the word. I merely want this to be understood, because it does not affect the question of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Let me say that this matter came up in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, of which I was a member, and again in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Long before any assignment of the equitable interest of it was made to any company. How anybody but the States of Massachusetts and Maine can be made the claimants in this case I am at a loss to make out.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, the Senators who are advocating this claim know very well that while it is here in the name of the State of Massachusetts the State of Massachusetts has no possible interest in it whatever. They know that as a fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That we have admitted distinctly on the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir. They know another fact, that if when the claim was made before Congress for the principal the interest had been made a part of that claim, neither interest nor principal would have ever been allowed.

Mr. SUMNER. We do not know any such thing.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator responds that he does not know any such thing. Well, Mr. President, I think he knows it about as well as he knows anything in heaven or on earth. And if in the argument of this case he denies that he does know it it only shows the anxiety that he has for the allowance of the claim. Massachusetts pressed this claim for years in Congress, and for a number of years it was not allowed. When it became comparatively worthless, by reason of its non-allowance, Massachusetts assigned it to a company; that company came here and prosecuted it in the name of Massachusetts. I voted for its allowance. I had witnessed during my term in the Senate effort after effort repeated, and I concluded that perhaps it had merit enough, or at least we should get rid of it by allowing it; but after that allowance is made this company are here again in the name of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and prosecuting the claim for interest upon that allowance. I hope, sir, it will not be made.

A question of order arises as to whether it is of a class of claims prohibited by a rule of the Senate. In the argument of that question of order the Senator from Massachusetts cites a dozen or more cases like it, he says, which have been allowed; and he says those laws are upon the statute-book. Why, Mr. President, it was the very prevalence of that habit that invoked the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. These are all since the rule.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand the honorable Senator to take up a statute absolutely smoky in its appearance in his hand and tell me that that book was printed since this claim was allowed and I voted for it?

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will understand me. I say the rule of the Senate is anterior to 1854. The eighteen precedents that I have cited applicable to the present case are all subsequent to that date.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, I was going to say, however the fact would be, my honorable friend would adhere to his statement; but I will not say that, because the Senator intends undoubtedly to be correct when he makes a statement.

Mr. SUMNER. I have cited the cases; I have the volumes.

Mr. CONNESS. It appears to me, sir, that we ought to have an end to this claim. I hope it will not be allowed.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, after listening to the arguments made on this question of order I cannot doubt that the rule of the Senate prohibits the consideration of this claim in connection with this bill. Now, let me see in a very few moments whether I can assign my own reasons for this belief.

An argument has been made in its favor of two kinds, if I appreciate it aright. Sometimes it is argued that this claim arises under an existing law—that argument was made yesterday—and sometimes it is argued that whether so or not, it is a claim not private in its character but public, and so it avoids the rule.

Mr. President, all the authorities which have been cited by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, although they escape the criticism suggested by the Senator from California, make nothing, absolutely nothing, in my estimation upon this question; and why? Because they are instances which occurred by common consent just as to-day, long after the morning hour had expired, Senators in all parts of the Chamber were permitted, nobody objecting to transact that species of business falling, under the rule within the morning hour alone. Now, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will appreciate, perhaps, better than members of this body who have done no service in the other House the extent of the distinction practically which I state. It is a rule of the House of Representatives that no bill containing an appropriation shall be considered at all unless it goes to a Committee of the Whole. How many scores of times have the Senator and myself witnessed the consideration to completion of a bill containing an appropriation without going to a Committee of the Whole; and when the point of order was made only a moment too late, when some member rising, but too slowly rising to interpose an objection, was told by the Speaker that it was too late; it had passed the nick of time in which that objection could be made. So here, day after day, considerations take place of business which if one member called the attention of the Chair to the rule and insisted upon its observance could not occur. So it was in 1859, when this section, ominously silent for the sake of the other branch of this argument in regard to interest, was added to an appropriation bill. Therefore, unless the Senator will show a case in which the Presiding Officer of the Senate or the Senate held such a proposition to be in order despite a point of order such as is made here, he shows, I submit, nothing in respect of authority cogent on this subject.

Now, take it in principle; and can it stand for one moment the criticism suggested by the rule? Is it a claim existing, substantiated by "existing law" within the meaning of the rule? What is the intention of the rule in that regard? I understood the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to make an argument yesterday substantially this:

"Here is a claim against the Government; how can it exist? Only upon those principles which we generalize by the name of law; ergo, it is a claim under existing law."

Is that the meaning of the rule? So far from that, no man can read it and doubt that it designs to admit a claim substantiated by existing law only in the sense of an act of Congress. Is that true of this claim? The reverse is specifically true upon the section adopted in 1859, which has been read; and as the Senator frankly said this morning, because that statute is silent, because nothing can be derived from it as authorizing the Treasury Department to allow this interest, this legislation is sought.

If it is not a claim under existing law, then the honorable Senator sees that if he can argue the Senate into the belief that it is not a private claim, he having been authorized by his committee to move it, he brings himself within the rule. Is it a private claim? The question is whether a railway corporation shall receive a sum which I am told amounts to $700,000 or thereabouts. That would make a claim very private in some senses certainly; but we are told that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is the assignor of this claim, and therefore it cannot be private. Why? Because a State is not a person, not an artificial person, not a corporation hac vice. Let us admit that the State of Massachusetts having been originally the owner of this claim it has not taken upon itself the qualities of a private claim.

Mr. President, test that argument for one moment by familiar instances in our history.

Take the French spoliation claims, which, if they existed at all, existed by the law of nations. When those claims had become the property of private assignees, whether speculators or not, were they private claims against the Government? Take any claim, however public or general in its character, when it becomes the subject of private ownership by a natural or an artificial person—because a corporation is only an artificial person—is it not private in its character? When you have reduced it to personal or private possession; when the whole jus disponendi is in the hands of a citizen, and nobody else is interested, is not that a private claim? If not, why not? Because, argues the Senator, at some anterior period of history it was a public claim in its ownership and representation. I submit that that distinction is wholly unsatisfactory; that this is a private claim; and that if it be in order under the rule no claim is out of order. I would like some Senator to state any claim which the rule would act upon if it does not act upon this—a claim which, according to the argument yesterday, does not arise under existing law in the compendious sense of general law establishing duty, and could not exist at all. Therefore, as to that branch of the argument, every claim that exists must be in consequence of existing law. That I answer by saying it means an act of Congress establishing it, and there is no such act here.

If it be said that this is not a private claim because it comes from a party owning it originally, not a private party, then I submit that all the claims which have been talked about in Congress for the last half century, public in their origin, although they have become peculiarly and some of them odiously private in their character, would be entirely void of offense against this rule. Now, sir, the proposition is that a railroad company deriving title, no matter how, pursues against the Government of the United States a demand of some hundreds of thousands of dollars. The merits of it I say nothing about, whether it should be paid or not; I speak simply of its character, and I submit to the Senate that it is clearly within this rule, and that it is idle for the Appropriation Committee to stand upon questions of order or anything else against appropriations at large unless the Senate will stand by the committee in resisting a proposition like this.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the precedents which have been quoted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me, are not met by the honorable Senator from New York when he says that it is to be presumed that those claims which have passed in a dozen instances or more by being put upon appropriation bills have passed without the objection being made that they were out of order. It is probable that no one did object that claims of this sort, in behalf of the different States of the Union, were private claims. I do not believe that the idea ever entered into the head of any Senator ten years ago to say that a claim by one of the States against the United States was a private claim at all. I do not believe the idea was ever conceived; it is a thing altogether of modern growth, a modern notion entirely, that States have become mere private corporations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin this question—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend will allow me I intend to occupy but a short time, and it is on this particular point.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was only on that point that I wished information, whether there can be any doubt that if the Government would pay this claim to the States of Massachusetts and Maine, having notice that it belongs to a railroad company, the Government would in legal contemplation have no discharge of the claim whatever. In other words, it is a private claim, no matter who the nominal party may be.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is anticipating a point which I intended to mention before concluding; but I will go on with the order of my remarks as I intended. I maintain that if there be any such thing as a public claim upon the Government of the United States it is the claim of a State of this Union. It is a claim as public in its nature as if that claim were in behalf of a foreign Power. If Great Britain had a claim against the United States it certainly would be public; we could not in any sense say that it was a private claim; and if any one of the States of this Union has a valid claim against the Government of the United States it is a public claim, just as public as if it were a claim against the Government of Great Britain or any one of the other Powers of the earth, because in our theory we have recognized the States as independent States, united under the Constitution it is true, having surrendered a portion of their sovereignty it is true; but yet, as among themselves and as between the States and the General Government, except where the Constitution has made it otherwise, they are public States like independent nations. The courts in all their decisions hold that States as between each other are like foreign States. The mode of receiving the records of the States proves it, they are received as coming from foreign States when duly certified.

Now, Mr. President, the question arises, what effect is to be given to the fact which I understand, and which has been stated here on the floor, that the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine has pledged, by a public act of those States, the proceeds of this claim to aid a railway corporation in constructing its line from the State of Maine to St. Johns. Now does that make the claim as between us and the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine any less a public claim? Those States have a claim. It belongs to them. They, it is true, in advance have said, "If we receive the amount of this claim we will pledge it for a given purpose." What is that purpose? That purpose is not private. There is nothing in the pledge itself, nor in the purpose for which the proceeds are to be paid, which is private in its nature, so far as the States of Maine and Massachusetts are concerned, nor so far as the Government of the United States is concerned. I undertake to say that the purpose for which these very proceeds are pledged is public; it is important, and one of the most important things that can be considered; I mean that which builds up a connection between the New England States and Nova Scotia. We of the West certainly should be the last representatives in this body to stand back when the Government has any legitimate mode of aiding in the development of highways which shall bind, not only our States together, but which shall open to us the commerce of the world. I do not think there is a railway projected, unless it may be the Pacific railroad, of more public importance or more national importance than a railway which shall connect at this moment with Nova Scotia. The railway, if once built, leading to Halifax, in Nova Scotia, will bind Nova Scotia to the United States in all its interests and in all its sympathies; and I, for one, am looking to the future on this question as well as to the present. It is all-important that that railroad should be built. Now, sir, we know very well that the United States have not public land in that direction which they can give to aid in the construction of these railways. The United States are not in a condition to give subsidies; but if the Government of the United States honestly owes the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine this sum of money, and they, through public considerations, have in advance pledged the proceeds, not to put them into their own Treasury, but to build a great public work for the benefit of the whole country, why should we talk about its being a mere private claim?

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator inform me when this claim was first presented?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that Maine and Massachusetts have been claiming it for twenty or thirty years.

Mr. GRIMES. When was it first called to the attention of Congress?

Mr. SUMNER. In 1820.

Mr. GRIMES. Has the Senator the application here?

Mr. SUMNER. I have it not here; but I think it is a matter of history, and agents were appointed by Massachusetts in 1825 and 1826, not for the interest, but for what is called the Massachusetts claim.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. In the Thirty-Eighth Congress it was presented with other claims.

MEETING OF NEXT CONGRESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the joint resolution authorizing the House of Representatives to meet at three o'clock on the 4th of March; which in order to make their arrangements to attend the inauguration, they desire to have passed now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) If no objection be interposed that subject may be considered now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is some question whether that resolution can be passed with safety. If they do not meet until three o'clock and we meet at twelve we only meet as part of a Congress. We are not called together by the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can assent that they meet at three o'clock. I ask that the resolution be read; and if it is objected to as a matter of course I will not press it now.

Mr. SUMNER. The first statute provides for the meeting of the session at twelve o'clock; and I understand this resolution will be in the nature of an amendment, authorizing the House of Representatives to meet at three o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; Congress will meet at three o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But Congress does not meet at twelve o'clock if this resolution is passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to its being read; but I think it should receive a little consideration before it is acted upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House desire to have it acted upon in order to enable them to make their arrangements to attend to the inauguration.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly so; but they cannot do it in consequence of the law as it stands. That is their matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the time for the first regular meeting of the House of Representatives of the Forty-First Congress be, and is hereby, postponed from twelve o'clock meridian, on the 4th day of March, 1869, to the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon of the said day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is any practical difficulty about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears no objection, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It strikes me there is an insurmountable difficulty in passing the resolution. As the law stands Congress meets at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March. That is the law. Congress consists of the Senate and House of Representatives. Now, if you pass another law that the House shall not meet until three o'clock the Senate cannot meet at twelve o'clock, because it is only as part of the Congress that the Senate can meet here at twelve o'clock at all; and you must have the Senate here to superintend the inauguration ceremonies. If the Senate were convened in executive session it could get together; but the Senate cannot get together as a part of Congress unless the Congress is to meet at that time. I have certainly no objection to a law being framed so that the House will not meet until at a later hour if you can so frame it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that the House desire first to participate in the inauguration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no objection to that; that is all right; but can you do it by this resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. Why may not the case be met by a proviso: "Provided that the Senate shall meet at twelve o'clock on that day."

Mr. SHERMAN. The law requires that.

Mr. SUMNER. It would make it certain; it would remove ambiguity.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts whether, under the Constitution, you can provide for the Senate to meet by itself; whether it must not be by the Executive calling it together? You can provide that Congress shall meet at a certain time; but can you by law appoint a time for the Senate to meet? I have not thought of the question before.

Mr. SUMNER. Nor I either. The question is a new one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The President can convene the Senate in executive session.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the only objection is the constitutional one I think the remedy is very easy. It is the one that we constantly apply when we meet with any difficulty. Let us propose a constitutional amendment on the subject. [Laughter.] We can pass it between this and the 4th of March without the least difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is no practical difficulty in allowing the House to meet at three o'clock on the 4th of March.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the Senate when it meets at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March? It certainly is not a Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the Senate of the United States whether the House meets or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can you do that? Can you provide by law for the assemblage of the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it is very important that the Senate should do anything before three o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate must be here in some capacity if it is here at all. If it is here to swear in the Vice President and the new Senators it must be here legitimately. Now, we meet at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March to administer the oath of office to the incoming Vice President and to administer the oath of office to the new Senators. We must be here in some capacity with authority to do so. Fifty persons cannot get together and do it. How are we here? We certainly are not here in executive session convened by proclamation of the President. If we are here we are here as a Congress. Now, you propose to change the law so that Congress will not meet at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator if he will allow me. Is there any difficulty in the House taking a recess at twelve o'clock until such hour as they please?

Mr. TRUMBULL. None at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Then what is the occasion for this resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state the occasion for it, and my friend from New York will see it at once. Under the law as it now stands the House of Representatives will meet at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March. It will take them longer to call over the roll of members than the whole inauguration proceedings will occupy, and consequently they will be denied the right to participate in that which the law contemplates and the Constitution contemplates should be open and public. There is the difficulty. When they meet at twelve o'clock they cannot do anything except to call the roll of members. No motion can be made until that roll is called and they have found out who compose that House. The result is that the time between twelve and three o'clock, or at least an hour or two hours, will be employed in the necessary preliminary business which must precede even a motion to take a recess. Now, why deny the House of Representatives the opportunity to participate in the inauguration ceremonies? Why not allow them to meet at three o'clock? There is no doubt of the legality of the proposition. There is no law and no provision of the Constitution to prevent it. The members of the House are now waiting, before making their arrangements for the inauguration, for our action and our consent to this modification of the law. Otherwise, merely because we will not give them that, they will have to remain in their own Hall and call the roll of members and swear in members, and then take a recess after that until the inauguration ceremony is over.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot, on reflection, doubt the legality of the proposed joint resolution. It seems to me that it is simply in the nature of an accommodation to the House of Representatives, enabling them to meet a few hours later than they would otherwise meet. But the Senator from Illinois asks the question whether, under the Constitution, the two Houses must not meet at the same time. I answer, the two, perhaps, must meet on the same day; but it is a familiar rule of law that unless under very peculiar circumstances the law will not inquire into fractions of a day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the objection to their agreeing, by a common understanding, not to call the roll of the House at all?

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the law is imperative that the roll must be called at once. Not a motion can be made; members must be in their seats; and then they must proceed to the election of a Speaker. There is, therefore, a difficulty in the conduct of the business of the House on that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law, which I have before me, requires that they shall meet at twelve o'clock meridian, and they cannot continue their existence except by taking a recess or an adjournment, and they cannot move a recess until they call the roll and ascertain who has the right to vote. That would more than occupy all the time during which the inauguration proceedings will take place.

Mr. SUMNER. I should say, under the joint resolution, the two Houses practically meet at the same time. They meet on the same day; but for the convenience of the other House it is arranged that it shall meet at the hour named. I think there can be no illegality in that. I would add, merely for the sake of caution:

Provided, That the Senate shall meet at twelve o'clock on that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator thinks it necessary—

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think it necessary; but it seems to me it makes the joint resolution perfectly secure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I guess you had better not put it on; let it stand as the House want it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I withdraw my proviso.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 968) for the coinage of nickel-copper pieces of five cents and under; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 968) authorizing certain banks named therein to change their names.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. THAYER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CRAGIN and Mr. STEWART submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the question of order raised on the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was remarking that I saw nothing in the pledge of the proceeds of this claim by Maine and Massachusetts to the building of a public highway to Nova Scotia which made it private in its nature. The purpose for which the pledge is given is a public one, a national one, and the highway itself is to be national in its character, reaching from New England into a province of British North America, which it is essential we should bind if possible by railway communication to the United States. Why, Mr. President, in what condition do we now stand? I only refer to what is stated in the public newspapers and to nothing which transpires in the Senate in secret session. We know, if we are to rely upon the public statements on this and the other side of the water, that an important treaty lately negotiated between Great Britain and the United States is likely to be rejected by the Senate of the United States. We know that the subject-matters involved in that treaty are of the most important character; our relations to Great Britain are the most delicate; and no man now can foresee what is to come out of the difficulties existing between Great Britain and ourselves. With our boundary line upon the Northwest still unsettled, and our claims upon Great Britain in reference to depredations committed by cruisers upon the high seas still unsettled, no man can know what is to come; but one thing we do know, that in view of our relations to the British provinces, especially to Nova Scotia, it is important that the Government of the United States should cultivate the most friendly relations with that province; and this public highway which is proposed to be built and to which the proceeds of this claim are pledged is, next to the Pacific railroad, one of the most important of the railways of the United States in a national point of view. I therefore maintain that neither when we look at the character of the claimants—the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine, being States of this Union—nor when we look upon the purposes for which they pledge the proceeds of the claims, if they are granted, can we regard this as a private affair? It is public in all its bearings.

A single word further, and I am done. I think that when we have been sustained in the West by the States of New England in the free donation of the public lands to aid in the building of railways, and also in the giving of large subsidies in the building up of a railway from here to California; and when in more fortunate circumstances, with the national credit better restored, we may reasonably hope that the Government of the United States may aid in the construction of two other railways across the Territories, binding the Atlantic and the Pacific together, I think if there does exist a just claim upon the Government in favor of Maine and Massachusetts for this amount of money the representatives of the West certainly can have no reason to resist the payment of the claim of Maine and Massachusetts, even though they have pledged the proceeds to the building of this national highway.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, rose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make an explanation before my friend from New Hampshire proceeds. There is a very great misapprehension with regard to the appropriation of this money. It is not absolutely assigned to this railroad company. The statute as it stands, as I am informed, and as I have no doubt, is simply a law that upon the completion of any ten miles of this railroad the State will appropriate $10,000 for each mile as long as this money lasts. The State keeps the claim in its own hands; it keeps the money in its own hands; but simply says with regard to this great public work, "We will pay to you out of our treasury so long as the proceeds of this particular claim last so much per mile when you have completed a certain number of miles." Now, what in the world can that arrangement between the State and the persons engaged in building this railroad have to do in changing the nature of this claim because it has made that agreement to appropriate that money in a particular way? And yet gentlemen talk as if this claim had gone out of the hands of the State entirely, whereas it is retained in the hands of the State.

Now, I wish to answer the question put by my honorable friend from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] He asks how the discharges should be obtained. The discharges could be obtained from the States, and in no other way. This is an appropriation to pay a claim of Massachusetts and Maine. The Treasury Department would pay this money over to nobody but to those States and would get their discharge. That is the mode in which it is to be done and must be done, whether the States have assigned the claim or not. That is a matter between the State and the assignee.

Now let me answer the question of law which is raised here. How is it in regard to a note of hand not negotiable on its face, as we understand the term "negotiable" at the common law? That note may be sold. All the interest in it may pass and does pass, but how must you bring a suit in a court according to the common law? You must bring it in the name of the assignor, the original payee. Can the defendant set up that that has been assigned, and that the original assignor, the person to whom it was given, has not any interest in it; that it is brought in his name and he has no interest in it? That never would be held to be a good answer in a court of law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose the way a suit would be brought would be in the name of the assignor for the use of the assignee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You would not say anything about the assignment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. You must at common law; and if a payment was made to the assignor by the party who owed the debt, and not to the assignee, I do not think the claim would be good. It is payable to the party who is beneficially interested if you have notice of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; suppose that is the case. I do not know what the practice may be in New Jersey, but I know what the practice at common law is, and that you say nothing about the assignment in a suit; you simply bring your suit in the name of the assignor and the matter of the assignment to the assignee is not stated, and it cannot be pleaded that the assignee is not a party to the suit. That is no matter of consequence to the defendant in the case. But even supposing that it is as the Senator states, the business of the Treasury Department is to get the proper discharges; and if the discharge of the State is not enough, then they can get the discharge of the person to whom the assignment is made. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not apprehend there was any difficulty in getting the discharges. I only asked that question as a test question, to see whether this claim did in fact belong to the States or the railroad companies, as to where you must go for the discharge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In getting the discharge we may do what we please; but as I said before the promisor of a note cannot take the point at all in any court of law. So far as he is concerned it is the claim of the original promisee, and he cannot inquire any further about it one way or the other. It is none of his business to whom it belongs. Moreover, I dispute the Senator's law. If the United States is notified by a party that it owns that claim it will have to have the discharge of the party; if it is not notified by any other party who owns that claim the discharge of the original owner is good.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is certainly so; but we are notified in this case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; then they are entitled to both of their discharges.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is not the question of discharge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, it is not a question of discharge; but it is the question which the Senator raised by way of testing the fact. I say, in answer to his question, so far as that is concerned it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, will the Senator answer me a question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will try to do so.

Mr. GRIMES. Has it not been repeatedly decided by the Senate that claims of States came within the rule of the Senate, and that they would rule them out of order just like any other claim?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator knows as much about that as I do. All I have to say is that the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has been hunting the records ever since last night when this amendment came up to find such an instance, and he has made his speech to-day and has not been able to find one.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not asking what the Senator from Ohio has found in the records. I am only asking the Senator if it is not within his own knowledge and recollection that that has been done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no knowledge and no recollection about it. If the Senator will show me a precedent I will admit it.

Mr. GRIMES. I recollect very well that it has been so decided, and that it was so decided by the Senate on my motion, when the Senator from Maine was conducting an appropriation bill through this body, and a proposition was offered in behalf of the State of Maine by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] who I understand, although I was not here when he spoke, said no such thing had ever happened.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was not a question of this kind.

Mr. GRIMES. It was a claim of the State of Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was a claim of the State of Maine, undoubtedly; but the point made by the Senator at that time, according to my recollection, was not that it was a private claim—

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, it was.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I remember the matter distinctly, and that the Senate decided against the admission of it. It was put to the Senate, and it was put to the Senate precisely in this way, "Will the Senate admit the claim?" It was not put as a decision whether it was a private claim or not. I remember the Senator's argument as well as his point, and I remember the case. The Senator's argument was thus: "Here it is, twelve o'clock at night of the last night of the session, and this is a bill!"

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I will ask the Senator if that was not an entirely different case? Was it not a claim of individuals for damages for land taken under the treaty?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it was.

Mr. SUMNER. It was.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the claim of individuals under the Eaton and other grants.

Mr. GRIMES. There are so many claims from the State of Maine that we may easily get them confounded, and I can pardon Senators for not comprehending exactly which particular claim was the one; but as I made the point myself, I think my recollection is quite good on that subject.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My recollection is that it was under the treaty. There was a claim made, I think, to the amount of $145,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; it was the claim of certain individuals whose land was taken under the treaty.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. And which the treaty provided should be quieted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; it was to quiet their titles. That was that claim. I remember it now.

But, sir, with regard to this matter I endeavor to keep myself within the rules of order and to argue a question of order, as I think it should be, without going into the merits. But when my honorable friend from Iowa makes this fling about "so many claims of the State of Maine," he will allow me to say to him, with great respect, that he knows that that has nothing to do with this question of order; and if the Senator wants to meet me on that, or to have me meet him on that point, I am willing to talk about the claims of the State of Maine or the grabs of the State of Maine against Iowa or any other State in this Union. If you want the question discussed as to how much money has been taken from the public Treasury and the public property I am ready for it. We ask for the payment of a debt if one exists, not for gifts.

Now, with regard to the claim that is particularly spoken of, all I have to say is that although the Senator may have made the point that it was a private claim, and being for private individuals it was so, yet the manner in which the question was put was precisely this: "It is now twelve o'clock at night, the last night of the session, and it is not right to bring up a question of this kind under these circumstances to be considered when the Senate has no time to consider it;" and the mode in which the question was to be submitted to the Senate was, "Will the Senate allow the claim to go upon this bill?" and it was decided in the negative, and I do not know but that it was properly decided. Those are the facts.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not wish to discuss the merits of the amendment upon the question of order as to the introduction of it; but I desire to answer the question of the Senator from Iowa. He wished to know when this claim was first presented. The claim for interest upon the advances made by Maine and Massachusetts in the war of 1812 was, so far as I know, first presented in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, but the claim upon the Government for the advances made in the war of 1812-15 has been before Congress almost ever since the peace after the close of that war. There have been three payments: a small payment made soon after the close of the war, a payment of over four hundred thousand dollars in 1830, and a payment of over two hundred and twenty seven thousand dollars in 1859. Now, the question is as to the interest on those principals. The reason why Maine and Massachusetts have not been here before asking interest is simply this: the last payment of principal was made in 1859; the civil war broke out immediately; and for one Congress, and one Congress only, the question went over. But in the Thirty-Eighth Congress they came and asked that they should receive interest on this principal just the same as Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, New York, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Washington Territory, and New Hampshire had received it. Provision was made during the Mexican war for the payment of interest on all the advances made for that war by the States on the very principle upon which this claim rests. I will give you the language of that act. During the Mexican war a general provision was made in the following language:

"That in expending moneys under this act and the resolution which it amends, it shall be lawful to pay interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum on all sums advanced by States, corporations, or individuals, in all cases where the State, corporation, or individual paid or lost interest or is liable to pay it."

Now, all that Maine and Massachusetts ask is to have the interest paid on the advances which they made the same as it was paid to all these other States. The principle laid down in the law is this: that wherever a State advances money to the United States for the prosecution of a war it shall receive interest where the State pays interest or loses interest. That is all that Maine and Massachusetts ask in this case. The case has never been closed. Here is the language of the Third Auditor, under whose eye this claim came. He says:

"It does not appear by either of the statements that any interest was allowed; nor is there any evidence on file in this office that any demand was made by the State for interest."

That is all that he says. They did not demand the interest until they got the principal, and were very glad to get the principal; and they did not get that for nearly half a century; and now they simply come here and ask that the same measure of justice may be given to them which has been given to the other States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We are on the question of order now.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am coming to that. The Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] claims that this is not a public claim but a private claim; and to prove it he says that Massachusetts has no interest in the claim and never had, and having no interest in the claim she made over what nominal claim she had to these railroad companies. The very reverse of that is true. Massachusetts, as a State, felt so much interest in it that her late lamented Governor came here and called the two Committees on Foreign Relations together and addressed them on the importance, the justice, and the honesty of this claim.

Mr. CONNESS. What I stated on that point was that Massachusetts held the claim in her own name while there was any prospect for pressing its payment successfully; but when that failed she assigned the claim. That was what I stated.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Not at all. In the Thirty-Eighth Congress Massachusetts made over her claim to these railroad companies, and why? In order to meet an appropriation which had been made in New Brunswick of $10,000 a mile for the building of a road from St. John's to the line, New Brunswick stipulating that she would give that amount to build this road if the States of Massachusetts and Maine would pay an equal amount to build the road from Bangor up to meet their road at the line. It is said that Massachusetts has no interest in this. This is a mistake; because it lessens one fourth the ocean path between this country and Europe and brings Boston two days nearer to Liverpool than she will be without the road. Does Boston feel no interest in the completion of this road? It brings over every pound of merchandise, it brings every passenger between London or Liverpool and this country two days nearer to New York, and brings them so much nearer to the constituents of the gentleman from Iowa; and therefore it is a matter of public interest, and the gentleman from Iowa ought to support it on that ground.

Mr. GRIMES. I fully understand the Senator now. He is putting it on the right ground. It is a question of building a railroad, not of paying a debt.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. It is a question of paying a debt in order to build a railroad. That is the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This being a question of order, the Chair feels it his duty to remind Senators that they should confine themselves to that question.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am very glad that at last the Chair has come to that decision.

Mr. BUCKALEW. By a reference to the Journal I find that on the 26th of February, 1861, the following proceedings occurred while an appropriation bill was under consideration:

"On motion by Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to amend the bill by inserting at the end of the first section:

"For the payment of the coupons outstanding and now unpaid accruing between the 1st day of January, 1854, and the 16th day of August, 1856, upon the bonds of the State of California, issued for the payment of expenses incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities prior to the 1st day of January, 1854, the redemption of which bonds was authorized by acts of Congress of August 5, 1854, August 18, 1856, and June 23, 1860, $177,196 23; said coupons upon being certified by the Third Auditor of the Treasury to be those designated by this section to be paid by the Secretary of War to the holder or holders thereof.

"A question of order was raised by Mr. FESSENDEN, whether the proposed amendment was in order under the thirtieth rule.

"The PRESIDENT, (Mr. CLARK in the chair,) submitted the question of order to the decision of the Senate.

"Is the proposed amendment in order under the thirtieth rule?

"It was determined in the negative."

As far as I can perceive this was a case exactly like the present, in which the State of California was interested. At sundry times at that session and the two preceding sessions an amendment was offered by Mr. Simmons, of Rhode Island, providing for the payment of one of these four claims on behalf of Maine and Massachusetts, which was uniformly ruled out of order on the ground that it was inconsistent with the thirtieth rule of the Senate. I remember also that two sessions since this question of whether a claim by a State for moneys advanced to the Government was a private claim or not was considered at an evening session. It was a session either devoted to private claims or to private bills; and after debate it was ruled and adjudged by the Senate that that was a private bill or a private claim, and therefore in order to be considered at that session, and the bill was passed. I believe it was a claim by my own

State. That was a distinct decision within my recollection upon precisely the question of order raised here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I do not mean to say anything on the merits of this case. I simply wish to call attention to the point of order. It is on that we are to vote, and not on anything else. In the first place, is the character of this claim changed because Massachusetts has generously pledged it to a public work? Certainly not. It is the claim of Massachusetts; it is not the claim of this railroad company. They do not appear here. They cannot appear here. Suppose Massachusetts had pledged it to the charities of the State; pledged it to the construction of the roads of the State or to any other of those interests which she delights to protect; that would not have come within the cognizance of Congress. It is enough that the claim belongs to Massachusetts, and it is for her in her discretion to assign it to any party or company she sees fit. Therefore, sir, do I insist that because this claim has been generously pledged by Massachusetts to a public interest it is none the less a public claim.

And now, sir, pardon me if I refer to the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who did me the honor to attribute to me an argument and then at very considerable length to answer it. I took no such ground as he did me the honor to attribute to me. I made no allusion to this claim as arising under any existing law. From the beginning I have put it on one single ground, and on that I stand: that it is a public claim and not a private claim. Others in the course of the debate may have adopted the ground to which the Senator from New York paid so much attention; I have not. I have insisted that it was a public claim; that is all.

And this brings me to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who, quoting Barclay's Digest, read to us a passage which he seemed to consider decisive. It was as follows:

"It has been the practice in Parliament, and also in Congress, to consider as private such [bills] as are for the interest of individuals, public companies, or corporations, a parish, city, county, or other locality."

Those are the words, and they are copied from parliamentary law; but, sir, on simply listening to them you will see at once that they are inapplicable to the claim of a State. A State is not in the view of this language "an individual, a public company, a corporation, a parish, a city, a county, or other locality." A State does not come under the head of "another locality." This language is borrowed from the parliamentary law. I need not say that under that law no such thing as a State is known. The preëminence of a State is peculiar to our own institutions. Its title on this floor is recognized by the Constitution of the United States. Its precedence appears in the daily order of business. It does not, therefore, come within the text that has been cited. It stands by itself.

Now, you are asked to decide the question of order whether a claim in the name of a State can be voted out of order as a private claim. I ask again the question, if this be not a public claim, pray tell me what is a public claim? Where will you find one? I need say no more, sir. The question of order can be decided but one way. Senators have searched for cases the other way. Where are they? The Senator from Iowa alluded vaguely to one which took place, but there is no assurance that it was in point, whereas I bring to you eighteen cases on your statute-book directly in point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. A general appropriation bill being under consideration, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] moved an amendment to add to it a section providing for a claim of the States of Maine and Massachusetts. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] raised the point of order that that was offensive to the thirtieth rule of the Senate. The Chair, under the sixth rule of the Senate, submits that question to the Senate. The question now before the Senate is, shall this claim be considered in order on the appropriation bill under the rule of the Senate?

Mr. WILLEY. I desire to state that I am paired off on this question with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. ABBOTT.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Rice, Sprague, Sumner, Vickers, Whyte, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Norton, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Corbett, Davis, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, and Yates—23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the judgment of the Senate the amendment is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer as an amendment to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the rank by brevet appointment in the Army shall be merely honorary, and shall confer no command or rate of pay or any other emolument.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Military Committee, to this amendment. I think it is rather too sweeping in its character. Where persons of the same rank mingle together those of brevet rank have command conferred upon them by their brevet, and this amendment goes so far as to prevent that. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to it.

Mr. WILSON. We abolished brevet rank last night. We passed a bill which clears the matter out, and I think the Senator had better let it stand as it is.

Mr. DAVIS. Does that bill obliterate all existing brevet rank?

Mr. WILSON. There will not be any more brevets unless they are for service on the field of battle and bear date from that time specially.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that proposition to be entirely prospective, and to leave the numerous cases of brevet rank in existence. At the time that I drew the amendment the proposition to which the honorable chairman of the committee refers had not passed, and I had no knowledge that it was passed, otherwise I might have omitted to offer this amendment; but I think the true spirit of brevet promotion is embodied in the amendment which I propose. It ought to be, like the Cross of the Legion of Honor instituted by the first Napoleon, entirely honorary in its character. This brevet rank has been very much abused in the Army of the United States. It has not been conferred in a great many instances upon the pure consideration of merit and of eminent military services, but has been the reward of favoritism and of undue influence by the persons who received brevet promotion with the appointing power. It has given rise to a great deal of discontent, and just discontent, among the officers of the Army. Young, inexperienced, and comparatively unfledged officers of the Army, by the exercise of enterprise and invoking the influence of men who had influence with the appointing power, have frequently got brevet rank that gave them the right to control and the right to rank men of much more age, much greater talent, and much more solid merit than themselves. A great many officers of the Army have made complaints in that regard. I think their complaints are just.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky will allow me I will state that on consultation with the chairman of the committee I understand he has no objection to the amendment, and I do not interpose any myself.

Mr. DAVIS. Very good.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I move to strike out the third section of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until otherwise directed by law there shall be no new appointments and no promotions in the Adjutant General's department, in the inspector general's department, in the pay department, in the quartermaster's department, in the commissary department, and in the medical department.

Mr. MORTON. I think that section is not a good one. It cuts off absolutely all promotion in these several departments. I think the right of promotion should be allowed to remain. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] yesterday, which was adopted, authorizes the President of the United States to reduce the Army. But whether in his judgment the Army ought to be reduced this year, next year, or the year following is not known. Here is an absolute provision that cuts off all promotion in the Adjutant General's office, the inspector general's office, the quartermaster's department, the commissary department, and the medical department. It seems to me to be entirely unjust and improper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say that this section came to us in the bill from the House of Representatives. It is general legislation, and did not for that reason commend itself particularly to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. But as the effect of it was not particularly understood it was amended by the committee in regard to the ordnance department and allowed to remain. I do not see but that the criticism of the Senator from Indiana is equally applicable to all the other departments; but unless the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs objects to its going out I raise no objection myself to the motion.

Mr. WILSON. I think this section had better stand as it is. I am clearly of the opinion that we have now six or seven hundred more officers in the Army than we shall need in a few months when the Army is reduced down, as it will be probably in six months, to about thirty or thirty-one thousand men. The number of officers was based upon an Army of about fifty-five thousand. We shall have taken off from twenty to twenty-five thousand within six months from this time. The number of the Army is now reduced to about thirty-seven thousand men. The term of enlistment for many of these men is rapidly expiring. We have more officers than we need, and we want to prevent the appointment of more officers into the Army and retire other officers as fast as we properly can.

I am against the wild warfare of which we have heard so much against the Army. I think the officers of our Army have served the country with great fidelity. Many of them bear honorable wounds. I think we owe them gratitude rather than hostility. But we must reduce the number of officers in the Army. The Senator from Indiana, if I understood his motion, proposes to strike out the third section entirely.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. That section will prevent the appointment of any more officers in the quartermaster's, commissary, and pay departments of the Army. We struck out the engineer department and ordnance department because we shall graduate in a few weeks at West Point perhaps forty or fifty cadets, and it may be that some four or five of these young men ought to be appointed in the engineer and ordnance departments, the scientific departments of the Army; but certainly in the quartermaster's department, the commissary department, the pay department, and the medical department we do not want any new appointments; and I think it would be just as well not to have any promotions until we get the Army down, for I think we have got to have some legislation on the subject in a very short time. The amendment that I offered and which was adopted yesterday authorizes the President to consolidate the forty-five infantry regiments into thirty regiments, so that we shall have fifteen regiments less, and the officers are to be assigned to the other regiments and we are to stop the appointments. We have no more cavalry regiments than we absolutely need. They are to be reduced in the number of men. But those regiments are on the frontier, in the Indian country, in sections of the country where they are compelled to move over large spaces. The number of artillery regiments is certainly not too large. It is proposed to reduce the Army, and by the plan as it stands it will be reduced in a very few months down to thirty-one thousand men. We certainly have five or six hundred too many officers, and the question is how to get rid of them and do it fairly and deal justly with them. I think we had better let the section stand as it is.

Mr. MORTON. The reduction of the Army has not begun; and even should the amendment that was passed yesterday be accepted by the House it leaves the matter entirely discretionary with the President. But even if the Army is to be reduced it seems to me there can be no propriety in providing by law that hereafter there shall be no promotions. Why, sir, the right of promotion, the hope of promotion goes to the very essence of the service; it is the stimulus to duty. But we here provide that as to all these departments there shall be hereafter no promotions. This section applies it to the adjutant general's department, the inspector general's department, the quartermaster general's department, and the commissary department. The committee have stricken it out in regard to the ordnance department and the engineer department. Why strike it out in reference to those two and not in reference to the others? But, sir, the principle of cutting off the chance of promotion is especially wrong. The question of reducing the Army has nothing at all to do with it. Whenever a man is entitled to promotion by means of great service or great ability in his department, and it is to the interest of the service that he should be promoted, the right to promote him should exist, and the number of officers has nothing to do with it. The question of making new appointments is another thing. It seems to me it would be very bad policy and would work great injustice to say that there shall hereafter be no promotions.

Mr. GRIMES. As the bill came from the House of Representatives it provided that there should be no promotions in any of the staff corps of the Army. I have no doubt that it could have been much more perfect, and would have been, had it said that there should be no promotions until each of the staff corps should be reduced to a certain number in each grade; but that was not the way the House of Representatives sent it to us, and the Committee on Appropriations, not being a military committee, did not choose to tamper with the proposition except that upon my suggestion the words "ordnance department and engineer department" were stricken out; and I can tell the Senator from Indiana why that was done. We graduate a certain number of young men at the Military Academy every year. A few of the best scholars, those who are best educated and best fitted for that department of military life, are assigned to the engineer and ordnance corps. If the section had remained in the bill as it stood they could not have been promoted from a cadetship into those corps. The officers of the other staff corps of the Army are not selected thus from the Military Academy; they are selected from the line or from civil life; and it was to meet that trouble and allow the corps of engineers and ordnance officers of the Army to be kept full from the academy that on my suggestion those words were stricken out.

The Senator, I think, is mistaken in supposing that there is a surplus of engineer officers. Why, sir, if we had passed the river and harbor bill we had before us the other day as we had finally amended it, I think we should have been compelled to add a very considerable number in addition to the present engineer corps of the Army in order to make the surveys authorized by that bill. I suppose there is no surplus in that corps and probably no surplus in the ordnance corps.

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me the explanation made by the Senator from Iowa makes this section more objectionable than it was before; and I wish to speak of it now, in connection with a part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday. His explanation is that into the engineer and ordnance departments promotions are made from the graduates of West Point; but these other departments are made up, not of graduates of West Point, but of persons appointed from civil life.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not state what the Senator attributes to me. I said that those officers in other corps were appointed from civil life and from the Army. And I say now, in reply to the statement of the Senator, that three fourths of them are appointed from the regular Army into those staff corps. There is not an officer in the inspector's department, there is not more than one I think in the adjutant general's department, hardly any in the commissary department, and very few in the quartermaster's department who have been appointed from civil life; so that that portion of the argument which is addressed to the populace seems to rather fall to the ground.

Mr. MORTON. I simply make the statement as I understood the Senator to make it. He now explains that a considerable portion of the appointments; especially in the inspector's department, he says, are made from the regular Army; but he knows, and I know, that so far as the quartermaster's department and the commissary department are concerned, and, in fact, in the other departments, a considerable proportion of them are from the volunteer service appointed from civil life.

Mr. GRIMES. There is not anybody in the inspector's corps, only one in the adjutant general's corps, and not more than one or two in the commissary corps taken from civil life.

Mr. MORTON. I call attention to a portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, which was adopted and which escaped my attention yesterday:

"That all officers rendered supernumerary by the provisions of this act shall be assigned to vacancies which may occur in their respective grades; and no appointments other than the graduates of the Military Academy shall be made to fill vacancies in any grade until all such supernumerary officers of that grade shall have been so assigned."

Now, Mr. President, if I had had my attention called to that section before it was passed I certainly should have objected to it. I am not in favor of slamming the door absolutely in the face of every man from the volunteer service. There are men who are not now in the Army, but who have rendered distinguished service during the war, young men, some of them I have a knowledge of, who are eminently qualified, who are brave and brilliant soldiers, who if there should be a chance presented should be in some way recognized. There are men who have served with great distinction during the late war; and if from time to time an occasion should occur when an officer of that kind can be recognized it ought to be done, at least there ought to be no provision of law that will prevent the Government from doing it.

But, sir, the section which I have moved to strike out seems to me to be in every respect improper. As I said before, promotion is the great stimulus to service; it is the great stimulus to the performance of duty, and as the Army has not been reduced and may not be reduced for the next five years, and the bill allows the President to refuse to reduce it at all until he sees proper, there can be no propriety, it seems to me, in cutting off all promotion in these departments. Promotion is left free in other departments. The President may make brigadiers out of colonels; he may make major generals out of brigadier generals. Promotion in all the higher grades of the Army is left free, but in these lower departments it is utterly cut off by this bill; and promotion is just as dear to subordinate officers as it is to those of higher rank.

Mr. WILSON. The opposition to that amendment made by the Senator from Indiana is no new thing here. Nearly two years ago an effort was made to prevent appointments in the Army because we had to reduce the force. We were under the necessity, of course, of stopping appointments, and we passed a bill to that effect; and it met this stern opposition and this talk about volunteer officers. We do not want any additional volunteer officers, and we do not need any more West Point officers, and I am willing to strike the whole of them out; but we want to stop appointments in the Army. We should have had one hundred or one hundred and fifty less officers to support in the Army, whom we do not need, if our bill had passed a year and a half ago. We have got to-day at least six hundred more officers than we need; and the question is how to get them out of the Army without doing injustice to them. The first thing is to stop appointments. We tried to do it. Then we held back, and I have now in my desk here a great number of nominations that have been held back all this session because we do not need more officers. The nominees are good men, first-rate men. It is a hard thing to have the President sending here the names of young men for appointments in the Army when we do not need them, and then have them come around us and beg to be confirmed and impose upon us the unpleasant task of refusing to do it; but until we decide that we shall make no more appointments we shall be afflicted in this way. If we want to reduce the officers of the Army the first thing to be done is to stop appointments.

The exception with regard to West Point graduates was made on this ground: we shall graduate forty, perhaps fifty, young men at West Point in a few months. We have educated those men for a specialty, for the Army; and if we say none of them shall be appointed they are out entirely and cannot be appointed.

When we reorganized the Army after the war we provided that half the officers should be appointed in these regiments from the men who had served in the volunteer forces. We have been just and generous to the volunteers. I would as soon have a volunteer as a man who comes from any other quarter. We required that a man should have been in the service to be appointed. We cut off all the men who had been educated at colleges, or wherever they were educated in the country; we said "No person shall be appointed into this Army unless he shall have served so long in the war." There never was a law framed in this country or in any other in the interest of volunteers who had served their country equal to that. We said to all the young men of the country, "No matter how well educated you are, no matter how well you understand military science, no matter how much you may desire to go into the Army, unless you have served two years in the war you shall not have a commission." That is the law of 1866. Volunteer officers were appointed and filled up the Army. Now, our Army has been reduced more than one third already. We have cut the Army down from fifty-six to thirty-seven thousand, and we propose to cut it down to thirty-one thousand; and the House proposed in the bill as they sent it to us to cut it down to twenty-four or twenty-five thousand. There is no doubt that that is too great a reduction for the present, at any rate. Perhaps it may be done a year hence. The size of the Army depends on the condition of the country and the needs of the public service; and you must change it from time to time, reduce it or increase it, according to the wants of the country.

Therefore we have got too large a number of officers on hand. We want to get rid of them. It was proposed by one Senator, I do not know whether he made the motion or not but he has an amendment to that effect, to offer officers of the Army a year's pay to induce them to resign from the Army. I wish that seven hundred of the officers of the Army would to-day resign. This exception was put in simply in regard to the West Point graduates, and if the Senator desires to strike that out I have not the slightest objection in the world, but I do insist upon it that this Congress shall put its foot down and say that we will have no more appointments in the Army. The exception was made with regard to the class at West Point who are to graduate this year; we have educated them specially for the Army, and it seemed to be a strange proceeding to throw out the very men we had educated for this special service. I am willing, however, that they shall go, if the Senate so decides.

The Senator says that the higher branches are not touched. By our amendment we propose to cut the brigadier generals down to eight; that is, we strike off two brigadier generals of the Army. Of course their places cannot be filled. I have no objection to cutting them down to a lower number if it is thought necessary. We strike off by this bill, if the President carries it out—and I have no doubt he will, and will do it in the next three or four months—fifteen colonels, fifteen lieutenant colonels, and fifteen majors; forty-five of the high officers. We consolidate the forty-five regiments of infantry into thirty regiments. Of course these officers have got to go out in some way, for we must reduce the number of officers in the Army in some form.

Now, if the Senator desires to strike out this exception in favor of those who are appointed from West Point I will not object, for I take it this bill will not last over a year. The exception only applies to the class about to graduate. We have got to reorganize and reconstruct and reduce the Army, and the number of officers must be reduced and brought down to a peace establishment, and that can be done, especially if our Indian wars disappear, and we hope they will, for we understand that there is to be a new policy in regard to the Indians; and we are all looking for peace and education and civilization of the Indians under the new policy that is soon to be put in operation. Then we may not need an Army of even thirty thousand, and may be able to bring it down to twenty thousand. But I do not think there ought to be any more appointments in the staff department of the Army, for we have too many there already. I think it would be better not to make promotions, but let the whole thing stand at present until we get the Army worked down lower and get out of it what officers we can, and then we can provide for the future. If the Senator desires to strike out the exception in favor of those at West Point in the amendment which has been adopted in committee, I have not the slightest objection in the world to his making that motion when the bill comes into the Senate and the question arises on concurring in that amendment.

Mr. MORTON. I do not desire to argue this question. I can only state that while it may be important to reduce the officers in the Army I am opposed to a declaration by law which will prevent the President from recognizing the services of any soldier, no matter what may be his merits, unless he is a graduate of West Point. This absolutely forbids any appointments hereafter except of graduates of West Point. I do not want to say so by law, and will not by my vote. The question of the reduction of the Army has nothing to do with that principle.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator what he proposes to do with the next class of graduates at West Point? I understand the Senator to be in favor of reducing the Army, but he wants it applied to soldiers who are appointed from civil life as well as to graduates of West Point. Now, what does he propose to do with them?

Mr. MORTON. So far as they are concerned I presume they will be taken care of in the same way. They will have some kind of employment, and I have no doubt they will be provided for.

Mr. GRIMES. But their term at the Academy will expire next June, and if they are not promoted into the Army we shall lose their services in the future. Now, what does the Senator propose to do with them?

Mr. MORTON. This has nothing to do with their rights. It does not give to them a new right of promotion, but it simply cuts off the right of everybody else. That is a very different thing. It is a declaration by law that nobody shall hereafter be appointed in the Army except a graduate of West Point. That is the whole of it.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator professes great desire for economy. He is in favor of reducing the Army; he has urged arguments in favor of reducing the Army; and yet he insists that persons in civil life shall be appointed in it. His argument would be very good if you wanted to increase the Army; but you do not want to increase the Army. Everybody is anxious to reduce it. Here are thirty young men on whom we have expended $10,000 apiece in preparing them for service to be rendered the public in their future life as military men. Is it wise, I ask the Senator from Indiana, to say that we shall dispense in all future time with their services; that we shall not avail ourselves of their education, but will turn them loose, as will be done if you do not admit them into the Army? Have you any right to insist upon it that they shall simply remain cadets with a compensation of $500 a year after they shall have completed their education in a sort of chrysalis state between promotion and cadetship. I am as much in favor of economy as the Senator; I want to reduce the Army; but I want the country to avail itself of the services of those young men whom we have educated, and I do not know of any way to do it except by appointing them to the Army as they shall graduate.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator says that I make great professions of economy. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not make any professions of the kind. I hope I shall practice economy, and that my votes in this body will show that I am in favor of retrenchment and reform; but I certainly have made no great professions on that subject. He inquires what we shall do with these graduates of West Point if they are not to be appointed in the Army. This section does not confer any right of appointment on them. They have got that now. This is not intended to confer a right of appointment as to them that does not already exist.

Mr. GRIMES. Where does it exist?

Mr. MORTON. But this section gives them the right of appointment over everybody else; it makes an exception as to West Point; that is it. That is a very different thing.

Mr. GRIMES. I would inquire of the Senator if it was not for that exception, if the section should stand without the exception, could any West Point cadets be appointed?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly it would then cut off everybody. Therefore the section in itself is not necessary. It does not give any new right to appoint West Point men; that right exists now; but it cuts off the right of everybody else, and that is what I am opposed to. Even if there should be no men appointed from civil life, if there should be none of the volunteer officers or soldiers of the late Army recognized, still the right of the President to recognize the services of those who have greatly distinguished themselves should be allowed to exist.

I say the thing is wrong in its principle, but as to the other section, the one I have moved to strike out, it contains two provisions; the first is that there shall be no new appointments; the second is that there shall be no further promotions. Promotions do not increase the number of officers, but give the right to appoint one of a lower grade to a higher grade where there is a vacancy or where an officer is entitled to it on account of distinguished services; and I say that the right of promotion and the hope of promotion is the great stimulus to the successful performance of duty. I think that that provision would be essentially impolitic and unwise if adopted, and it has not anything at all to do with the question of reducing the Army. It takes away the right of promotion as to all of these subordinate officers.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Promotions give pay; and in time of peace it is not honor that the officer seeks in promotion; it is the pay. The point urged by the Senator from Massachusetts is correct in this, that he does reduce the expenses of the Army in retaining the pay as it exists now. As to the appointment of civilians in the Army, those who come to me urging influence for appointments in the Army are invariably discouraged. I would confine the appointments to the Army to men from the military school, because I believe that in time of peace it is no place for a useful, energetic, and enterprising American citizen. His place is in the workshop or in the field; his place is in and among the enterprises which lay open to an American citizen beyond the citizen of any other country in the world; and promotions here simply increase the expenditure of this Government and the taxes of the people, when the service of those whom you propose to promote is of no greater value when they are promoted than before the promotion takes place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the bill by inserting after line one hundred and eighty-three:

For surveys for military defenses, $200,000.

I will simply say that the estimates were for that amount. I have here a letter from the Secretary of War, and one from the General-in-Chief of the Army, urging very strongly that we shall make this appropriation. I will have them read if it is necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They had better be read, as the proposition is to increase the appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. Let General Humphrey's letter first be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS CORPS OF ENGINEERS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1869.

GENERAL: In the regular annual estimates submitted by me for the operations of the corps of engineers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, there is an item for military surveys, $200,000, that has been placed in the river and harbor bill, but which ought to be in the Army bill, since it is for the regular expenditures of the corps in connection with military operations and defensive purposes.

From the appropriations made under this head are carried on all the reconnaissances, explorations, and surveys in connection with the military operations and the establishment and maintenance of the military posts and depots in the interior; all the geographical and geological explorations, which are as essential for military as for other great national uses, and all the surveys, such as we are now making on the Pacific frontier, required for the preparation and execution of plans for sea-coast defenses.

The appropriations heretofore made for military surveys will be exhausted in two months time, notwithstanding the efforts made to economize strictly in all the operations.

The appropriation asked for is necessary to carry on the engineering part of the regular military duties referred to, and I beg leave to request that the item named may be transferred to the Army bill from the river and harbor bill, and the appropriation urged as an essential Army expenditure.

I beg leave further to suggest that provision be made in connection with this item for the preparation and publication of the results of these surveys, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the expense to be borne from any balance of appropriation for the War Department that may not be required for other purposes.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier General of Engineers Commanding,
Major General J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 22, 1869.

The Secretary of War has the honor to submit to the Senate of the United States the accompanying communication from the chief of engineers, asking that the item of $200,000 for military surveys, estimated for in the annual estimates of the engineer department of the Army for the next fiscal year, be transferred from the river and harbor appropriation bill, in which it has been put by Congress, to the Army appropriation bill, it being required for military purposes.

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move the following amendment, to come in after line one hundred and eighty-three:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to have prepared and published the report of the results of the exploring expedition and survey of the line of the fortieth parallel: Provided, That the cost of the same shall be defrayed out of existing appropriations in the War Department: And provided further, That the letter-press work shall be done at the Public Printing Office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is that covered by the letter?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, or some gentleman who has looked at this work, to tell us what is the object of surveying the fortieth parallel any more than the forty-ninth or forty-third? What are the national consequences of it? What is the consequence in point of policy connected with the Army?

Mr. WILSON. I call for the reading of the letter of the General-in-Chief of the Army.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 26, 1869.

SIR: Understanding that your committee have struck out of the appropriations for river and harbor improvements the sum of $100,000, I take the liberty to express to you the opinion that it would be of great public advantage to have that amount restored, and the total sum of $200,000 transferred from that appropriation to an appropriation for military surveys, &c.

A work of vast importance to the mining interest of the country has progressed from the Pacific coast eastward to the east end of Salt Lake, taking in a belt of country one hundred or more miles in width along the line of the Pacific railroad. The appropriation here asked for is necessary to complete this work to the plains east of the Rocky mountains. When done, and published for the information of the public, the miner and the agriculturalist will have complete information of the resources of the country described agriculturally and mineralogically. In military operations, should any be necessary, the information will be of vast importance.

I would add to this recommendation the further recommendation that authority be given to the Secretary of War to publish the results of these surveys, when completed, and to pay expenses of the same from any unexpended appropriations under his control.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT, General,
CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I wish to offer an amendment as an additional section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before that motion is put, as we have but ten minutes left, I move that the order for a recess be suspended, and I will renew it again if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the order relating to a recess at four o'clock be postponed until the conclusion of this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall finish something. This bill will be finished in a little while if Senators will consent to stay. It will not take long. Of course we can adjourn at any time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We stay here until about half after ten at night. We ought to have some little time for rest.

The question being put, it was declared that the motion appeared to be agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion agreed to was that the time for taking a recess, fixed for four o'clock to-day, be suspended until the Senate reach a determination of this subject.

Mr. HOWE. That is not agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be a very indefinite period. The Senator from Massachusetts intends to renew his amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to finish this bill to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. I expect in the Senate to renew the proposition which I have already moved relative to the Massachusetts claim.

Mr. CONNESS. That need not extend the time if the proposition be renewed. The discussion has been all had, and the Senate is more full, and can vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator is not satisfied with the vote, a division can be had.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So far as I am concerned, I express the most entire satisfaction. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair said the motion was carried, which was to suspend the time for taking a recess from four o'clock until a decision should be had on this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not satisfied with that.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for a division.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to say that we are informed here that this Massachusetts claim is to be brought up again and pressed. That will keep us all night.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I modify my motion, and move to suspend the order for taking a recess altogether.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the order for a recess be rescinded.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; that is my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on that motion?

Mr. HOWE. I am ready for the question; but I do not want the Senate to agree to that motion. I have no objection that the hour for taking the recess be postponed fifteen or thirty minutes, or an hour for that matter, if it is necessary; but I fear that the effect of the motion now made will be on a question of order inevitably to use up this evening. I suggest that the Senator take half an hour.

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. My only object is to secure the passage of this bill because we have spent so much time on it and I have another bill to consider to-morrow; but I am willing to experiment with half past four o'clock; I will modify the motion in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator moves that the time for taking a recess be extended until four and a half o'clock.

The motion was declared not to be agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. Now I move a suspension of the order for a recess.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

Mr. HOWE. I shall have to call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I objected to the motion. I should like to know whether it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This motion can be entertained by unanimous consent, there being another question before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the other question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose it is competent for me to move a suspension of the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Army bill may be laid aside informally for that purpose, no objection being made.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

Mr. STEWART. I believe I have a question that is privileged above the other.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

Mr. STEWART. That will not do any good.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will try it on. I propose to hold on to the Army bill or nothing. If the Senate does not propose to pass the Army bill, be it so—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of a committee of conference is not a privileged question; and the Chair understands that that is what the Senator from Nevada wishes to present.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Maine listen to what I have to say?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I do not listen to anybody now.

Mr. STEWART. Then I will address the Chair if I am in order. I wish to say that I expect this evening to call up a privileged question; that is, the constitutional amendment. I wish to make a report from the committee of conference on that question and have it acted on. I want to give notice so that Senators may be here. That is what I wish to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the order for a recess be rescinded, and on this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I want my friend, the Senator from Maine, to understand that my only reason for opposing a suspension of this order is my conviction that it is going to rule me out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not the slightest idea of trespassing on the Senator's time, but I want to finish this bill.

Mr. HOWE. I know the Senator has no disposition to trespass on my time, but it is clear to me that that is going to be the inevitable effect; it will take the whole of the evening to dispose of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called.

The Chief Clerk called the name of Mr. ABOTT.

Mr. RAMSEY. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is four o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not quite four o'clock. The call will proceed.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to know what has become of my objection to entertaining this motion pending the consideration of the Army bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair said it would be entertained if there be no objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I objected. I suppose it will be in order to move an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania can make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The roll-call has commenced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No response was made, and so the call has not commenced.

Mr. McCREERY. The hour of four o'clock has arrived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now four o'clock, and the Senate will take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant, reports upon the free-port system of Mexico upon the Rio Grande and the frauds upon the revenue connected therewith; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 968) for the coinage of copper-nickel pieces of five cents and under was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

O. P. COBB AND OTHERS.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to call up a joint resolution that I presented to-day for the reference of the claim of Cobb and others to the Court of Claims. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 237) to refer the claim of O. P. Cobb and others to the Court of Claims.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMPHIS AND EL PASO PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. Now I ask the Senate to take up House joint resolution No. 465, granting the right of way to the Memphis and El Paso Pacific Railroad Company from El Paso to the Pacific ocean, merely for the purpose of reference. I desire to have it referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion to take up the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I hope that resolution will not be referred to any committee. It is a resolution that contains no subsidy, no grant of land, but simply gives the right of way. It has been acted upon by the House of Representatives, and it is important that it should pass the Senate this session. I trust, therefore, that the Senator will not ask to have it referred to any committee.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a bill of considerable importance, and I think it ought to be looked into by the committee; and I can assure the Senator from Indiana that it will be reported back to-morrow from the committee if it is referred, so that no time will be lost.

Mr. MORTON. It has already been reported, I believe, by a committee.

Mr. HOWARD. A committee in the House, not in this body. I think it had better take that course. It will not delay it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad if there be no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 953, which I suppose will not occupy much time.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Indiana would let me go on.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not know the Senator had come in.

Mr. HOWE. This evening has been set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will not interfere with the Senator.

EDWARD E. SHEAD.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 265.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine, two six per cent. coupon bonds, for the sum of $500 each, in lieu of two bonds destroyed by fire, bearing date 18th of August, 1864, numbered 19,747 and 19,748, payable in 1881.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELLA E. HOBART.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 280.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 280) for the relief of Mrs. Ella E. Hobart. The bill provides that Ella E. Hobart, who was appointed as chaplain to the first regiment of Wisconsin volunteer heavy artillery, shall be entitled to receive the full pay and emoluments of a chaplain in the United States Army for the time during which she faithfully performed the services of a chaplain to the regiment the same as if she had been regularly commissioned and mustered into service.

Mr. HOWE. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of that bill, as the same subject is reported upon favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged.

MARY A. FILLER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 425.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 425) for the relief of Mary A. Filler. The preamble recites that Sergeant Henry Drenning, late of company K, fifty-fifth regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, was killed at Cold Harbor, in Virginia, on the 3d of June, 1864, leaving no widow nor heirs lineal or collateral; but he was the adopted and foster son from childhood of Mrs. Mary A. Filler. The bill therefore provides that she shall be entitled to receive the back pay due to him at the time of his death, and the bounty to which he would have been entitled by law, and in these and all other respects shall have the same rights and benefits as if she were his natural and lawful mother.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment to the bill, to strike out after the word "law," in line six, the words "and in these and all other respects shall have the same rights and benefits as if she were the natural and lawful mother of said Henry Drenning."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE KAISER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1867.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of George Kaiser was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay George Kaiser the sum of $181 50 for labor and material furnished in building a hospital at Parkersburg, West Virginia, in 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC WATTS.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1128.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1128) for the relief of Isaac Watts. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury and pay department to pay to Isaac Watts all arrears of pay, bounty, or other allowances due from the United States to his adopted son, Samuel Watts, late a private of company H, eighty-first regiment infantry, Ohio volunteers, the same in all respects as if he had been the son of Isaac Watts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

N. A. SHUTTLEWORTH.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 284.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 284) for the relief of N. A. Shuttleworth, of Harrison county, West Virginia. The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to N. A. Shuttleworth, of Harrison county, West Virginia, late captain in third regiment Virginia volunteers, the sum of $550 66, to reimburse him for the same amount paid by him for the transportation of recruits in 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANTHONY BUCHER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1326.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1326) for the relief of Anthony Bucher. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate and, if in his opinion it shall appear proper, issue to Anthony Bucher a Treasury note for fifty dollars, to supply such a note as shall appear to have been destroyed by fire (and belonging to him) in the summer of 1867.

Mr. HOWE. That bill has passed the House; but the Committee on Claims of the Senate reported adversely upon it. I shall move that it be indefinitely postponed; but I do not know but that it would be fair that the report should be read, that the reasons of the committee for disagreeing with the House should be made known to the Senate. There may be some question about the propriety of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not read the report unless somebody calls for it.

Mr. HOWE. Well, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

H. G. AUKENY.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1130.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1130) for the relief of H. G. Aukeny, late captain fourth Iowa infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to instruct the Secretary of War to reimburse to H. G. Aukeny, late captain fourth Iowa infantry, the sum of $299 50 out of any appropriation made or hereafter to be made for the recruiting service of the United States Army.

Mr. HOWE. I make the same motion in regard to that bill, that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARLAN. I would rather it should go over until I can look at it.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over if there be no objection.

CHAMPE CARTER, JR.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1255.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1255) for the relief of Champe Carter, jr. It directs the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands to pay to Champe Carter, jr., late sub-assistant commissioner of the bureau for the counties of Robertson and Milam, in the State of Texas, the sum $526 50, being the amount due to him for services as sub-assistant commissioner from the 17th of March, in the year 1866, to the 29th of August, 1866.

Mr. HOWE. I make the same motion in regard to this bill; and I will state the case in one word. This claimant was appointed a sub-assistant commissioner of freedmen in Texas, and served two months. It turned out that he had been an officer in the rebel army, and the officers of the bureau refused, as they were obliged to refuse, to pay him for his services, because there was no authority of law for paying him. The case shows that he did his duty well; and the chief of the bureau, General Howard, certifies that he would have paid him if he had had authority; but the committee did not feel authorized to recommend the payment to the Senate. I therefore move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. ASHBURN.

Mr. HOWE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 36.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) for the relief of George W. Ashburn. The preamble recites that George W. Ashburn seized certain property belonging to F. Stewart, in the State of Tennessee, which property was being used by the southern confederacy; that the property was afterward confiscated by the district court of the State of Tennessee, under the provisions of the act of Congress of August 6, 1861, and was by the order of the court sold and the proceeds placed in the Treasury of the United States, including the portion that belonged to Ashburn, under the provisions of the act, which amount still remains in the Treasury. The joint resolution therefore directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George W. Ashburn the sum of $3,888 37, the amount belonging to him under the act according to the decree of the district court.

Mr. HOWE. I move the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

S. AND H. SAYLES.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 957.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 957) for the relief of S. and H. Sayles, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to pay the sum of $88,688 15 to S. and H. Sayles, of Killingly, Connecticut, in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands whatsoever upon the Government of the United States arising out of a contract made by them in the month of March, 1865, to furnish clothing for the Army of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. COLE. I have many doubts about the propriety of the passage of this bill. It arises out of a contract in the quartermaster's department; and, as I remember the facts, the Sayles Brothers entered into the contract with an understanding as to the quality of the cloth which was to be furnished, and the contract when accepted by them and by their agents was binding upon them; and to require the Government to pay the extravagant sum of $88,000 for a refusal on the part of the Government to accept their cloth because it did not come up to the standard required in the contract seems to me, to say the least, unreasonable. The quartermaster had the power to accept or reject the materials that were furnished in pursuance of the contract. It was a matter of clear discretion with him. When the cloth did not come up to the standard specified in the contract, he exercised that discretion and rejected it. These parties now claim damages arising to them, as they allege, because of the rejection of the material which they were to furnish under the contract. I do not believe that the amount of damages that is claimed in this case can be sustained. The cloth that was alleged to have been furnished or brought forward by the contractors, Sayles Brothers, was sold at a very low rate. They were to have $1 50 a yard from the Government. That same cloth, on being put into the market, was sold at a very low rate, I think at not more than about one third of that price, which is some sort of evidence of the want of value of the article. They may have put it on the auction stand and had it disposed of at a lower rate than it would have brought in the market, where there could have been more deliberation in reference to the purchase; but they sold the same product that was assumed to have been made for the Government at a very low figure; the chairman of the committee can state how much a yard, but I believe it was only about one third of $1 50.

Mr. HOWE. From sixty to seventy cents a yard.

Mr. COLE. From sixty to seventy cents a yard, I am informed. If we are to make good to all contractors losses which they allege to have sustained by reason of a failure on the part of the Government or on the part of the contractors themselves to comply with the contracts we shall find ourselves in many difficulties beyond this. This will be regarded as a precedent for others who have not come up to the standard required in the contract for the articles they were to furnish, and they, too, will come upon the Government to be remunerated at some extravagant rate for losses which they allege they have sustained.

None of this cloth, by the way, was received by the Government. If I remember the contract, it contained certain specifications that the cloth was to possess a certain amount of strength when stretched lengthwise and a certain amount of strength when stretched laterally and a certain amount of strength when tested by a diagonal power applied to it; but the cloth did not come up to the standard, and was for that reason rejected. It is true that a portion of the cloth that was to be furnished, a portion of the two hundred and fifty thousand yards, was sent to Cincinnati, where the bidding was made. I think one hundred and fifty thousand yards are alleged to have been sent there and offered to the Government; but none was received, for the best reason in the world, that it did not come up to the standard specified in the contract. Now they allege that the standard of cloth mentioned in the contract was higher than that required by the Army generally; that cloth of that particular strength was never furnished; but it is to be presumed that they entered into the contract expecting to perform it according to the letter of the contract; and having made the contract, I do not know why they should not be required to comply with it, or suffer the consequences the same as all other contractors of the Government.

Mr. HOWE. I would not take a moment to explain this case but for the amount involved, which is considerable. I have examined a large volume of testimony in the case which shows the facts which I will briefly state, for the whole gist of the case is in a very small space. These claimants reside in the State of Connecticut. The quartermaster at Cincinnati, in 1865, advertised for proposals to furnish sky-blue Army cloth—Army kersey. He required that the cloth to be furnished should be according to samples which he stated in his advertisement were on exhibition in his office and could be seen there; and he required that each bidder should exhibit a sample of the cloth he proposed to furnish. The claimants, the Sayleses, made a bid through agents in Cincinnati, and proposed to furnish cloth at $1 50 per yard, and furnished a sample of the cloth that they would furnish. That was in March, 1865. Their bid was accepted for two hundred and fifty thousand yards, and their agents notified them at once by telegraph that their bid was accepted. In a few days after that the quartermaster put up a printed note notifying them officially that their bid was accepted. That notice was directed to them at New York instead of at Killingly, and they never received it. It came from New York to the dead-letter office, and from the dead-letter office it was returned to the quartermaster at Cincinnati.

Some five days after the awarding of this contract to the Sayleses, the quartermaster drew up a contract in form, and in the written contract he inserted specifications as to the kind of cloth that should be furnished—specifications which never had been heard of before by the contractors nor by their agents. The specifications required that the cloth should be equal to bearing a certain strain in each direction. That contract was misdirected and went to New York instead of to Killingly. That contract they did not get for weeks. After they had been notified that theirs was accepted, and after they had entered upon the performance of their contract, when they received the written contract, they said at once, "We cannot comply with these specifications; no cloth can be made equal to them;" and they proposed to refuse the execution of the contract. They were advised by their commission merchants, however, that they had better sign the contract and send it to their agents at Cincinnati, to be delivered only in case the quartermaster would waive the written specifications and stand upon the samples on which the bid was made. Acting upon that advice they sent the contract with their signature attached to their agents, and their agents delivered it to the quartermaster; and they say it was understood between them and the quartermaster that the written specifications were to be waived. The quartermaster was before us. He did not recollect that he ever specifically waived the specifications, but says he thinks it very likely he did, for he supposed at that time that the specifications were substantially the same thing as the samples.

The contractors went on making their cloth. The first installment was to be delivered: the first week in May, and was delivered and was received. My friend, the Senator from California, is mistaken in saying it was not received by the Government. It was received by the quartermaster and stored in the Government warehouse. The contract required that the first installment should be delivered in the first week in May and be delivered in weekly installments as nearly equal as possible from that time until the whole was delivered. They went on manufacturing and shipping to Cincinnati until one hundred and fifty thousand yards were received. The contract required that it should be inspected as fast as received or without unnecessary delay. The evidence shows that not a yard was inspected until some time in July; I think it was the 20th before a single yard had been inspected. Not all of it had been delivered at the Government warehouse, but they delivered and received at the Government warehouse just as much as their warehouse would hold, and they had said to the agents of the manufacturers that they must not deliver any more because they could not store it, and therefore they kept the balance in their warehouse. When the cloth began to be inspected in July it was found it was not equal to the specifications contained in the contract; it would not bear the strain which the specifications required that it should bear. The evidence in the case satisfies us that there never was any cloth made in the world which would bear it.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator ought to state that it was equal to the sample and better than the sample.

Mr. HOWE. All who have inspected the cloth concur in two things: first, that it was better than the sample furnished by the bidders and better than the samples kept by the quartermaster as the Army standard. And they concur in another thing, and that is that it was the best cloth ever purchased and delivered at that depot in Cincinnati. Those three things they establish; but they all agree that it was not equal to the specifications; and the testimony satisfies me, and I believe the committee—it satisfied the board which was called to examine the subject in the War Office—that there never was any cloth made that was equal to the specifications, and, in point of fact, that the specifications were a blunder.

The assistant quartermaster at Philadelphia, who recommended the adoption of these specifications by the Quartermaster General, testifies that he is satisfied he was mistaken about it, and was deceived by the machine which was furnished him to test cloth. As I said, no inspections were made until the 20th of July; then there was some doubt as to whether they would stand by the specifications or would inspect cloths according to the samples. The Quartermaster General finally decided to stand by the specifications, of which these parties were notified in August; and thereupon they delivered no more cloth. One hundred and fifty thousand yards were all that they had manufactured up to that time, for which they should have had $1 50 a yard if it had been accepted by the Government. It was not accepted, and they were obliged to sell it. They sold it after free conference with the Secretary of War and by his permission, he not taking any responsibility about the sale, but saying that he should take no advantage of it. The Government did not take the cloth; it was sold by commission merchants in New York. The committee have an account of the sales, and they have awarded to the contractors just the difference between what the cloth brought in the market and the amount which they were to have. The contractors say that it will not nearly make them good because they had a large amount of material on hand, purchased in view of this contract and with which to fill it on which there had been an immense decline in price owing to the close of the war; and yet the committee declined to consider these items, and have reported a bill here to pay the claimants just the difference between what they got for these goods and what they were to have, and that upon the ground, which seems beyond all question, that the cloths were better than the samples furnished either by the bidder or by the quartermaster, and which were descriptive of the real articles to be manufactured under the contract.

Mr. COLE. It seems, after all, that these parties entered into this contract with their eyes open. They, according to the statement of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, were advised to enter into the contract after their hesitating to do so by their agents in New York, but with directions given at the same time to parties in Cincinnati not to deliver the contract if the specifications were still adhered to. These specifications appearing upon the face of the contract were seen, not only by the parties now claiming relief, but also by their agents in Cincinnati, and with these specifications before them they go on and furnish this cloth by installments, so many yards per week, and continued this until they have furnished one hundred and fifty thousand yards. We are now told that this cloth, after all, was better than any that had been furnished at that quartermaster's station previous to this. That is not a very good argument in favor of this, in view of the fact that during the war a very large amount of cloth was furnished the quartermaster's department of the Army that was of very little value. There was a great deal of shoddy furnished, and all that may have been furnished at that particular quartermaster's station prior to this may have been of very inferior quality.

If these parties have recourse upon anybody it seems to me it ought to be upon their agents and not upon the Government. If they were deceived by their agents in Cincinnati or by their consignees in New York, their recourse ought to be in that direction, and not against the Government of the United States. They knew at the time they entered into the contract whether they could comply with it or not; and if their agents still went on, and if they continued to act under the contract and in pursuance of it in all respects except as to the quality of the cloth, their recourse is certainly elsewhere than against the Government of the United States. I think we are setting a very bad precedent in relieving these contractors of the Army at the distance of four years after the war is ended, a distance of five or six years, it may be, after the contract has been made, from the alleged injury that they claim they have sustained by reason of any fault on the part of those who may have been acting on behalf of the Government.

I have no doubt that if we pass this claim others who have made contracts with the Government, not merely for cloth but for all of the ten thousand objects that have been comprehended in contracts with the Government, will come forward with their claims in like manner. I cannot, therefore, but regard it as an exceedingly dangerous precedent to be established at this time, and I hope the bill will not pass this body.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I will say one word in relation to this claim. The committee had it under consideration a considerable time and bestowed upon it very careful attention; and I came to the conclusion as a member of the committee that the claim was meritorious, and I think so still.

The objection which is most strongly urged by the honorable Senator from California is based upon the written contract which was signed by these gentlemen. It is a sufficient reply, at least sufficient in my judgment, that the contract which they thus signed was a very broad departure from the contract into which they entered with the Government at the time of the bidding in Cincinnati. The contract was not made out until some time after the Sayleses' were notified by their agent that the contract had been awarded to them. On receiving a telegraphic dispatch to that effect, they proceeded at once to make preparation for going on and performing the whole of the work by going into the market and purchasing the wool and the materials necessary for the manufacture of the cloth. They had thus invested a pretty large amount of money before the contract, so called, was transmitted to them in writing. When they came to examine the written contract which was thus submitted to them they saw at once that it did not contain the same specifications which were referred to in the advertisement under which they made their bid and under which they really entered into the contract and upon the enterprise itself. The written contract upon which the Senator so much relies was, as I remarked before, a broad departure from the one into which they had already entered; but in order to go on and effectuate their bid they were in some sort constrained to sign the contract which was submitted to them, but not until a considerable time had elapsed after they had entered upon the performance of the work itself.

It struck me that inasmuch as this written contract thus entered into contemplated a different kind of cloth from that which they had agreed to manufacture, and was a far harder and more stringent contract than they had any grounds to expect they would be compelled to perform, and they having under these circumstances of pressure and necessity entered into the bargain so far as they were concerned, the contract became a hard one, imposing on them a hardship and duty which they found it impossible to perform. They did not perform it; they could not perform it. It was not contemplated when their bid was accepted at all, and was never insisted upon. No notice was ever transmitted to them that they would be expected to perform the terms of this written contract with strictness. And under the circumstances it has struck me that it would be a grievous and great hardship to require of these contractors the performance of an impossibility, such as the written contract required them to perform. They entered into and signed that contract, as I have remarked, by a pressure which they could not get rid of.

Mr. COLE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Was it any authority of the Government, or the Government in any sense, that constrained them to enter into the contract? It was, as I understood, their own agents who urged them to enter into it. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HOWARD. I think not. The truth is the contract was completed and became a binding contract both upon the Government and upon the Sayleses, at the time the Sayleses were notified that their bid had been accepted by the Government. There was the end of the contract as between the contractors and the Government, and they performed that contract acceptably and sufficiently, and they neither could nor would submit to perform the contract which was afterwards presented to them and which turned out, in proof before the committee, to have been practically an impossibility.

Mr. COLE. Will the Senator from Michigan be so good as to tell us who did constrain them to enter into that written contract?

Mr. HOWARD. They were constrained by circumstances. This contract was presented to them. They had purchased a large quantity of wool for the purpose of manufacturing the article according to their bid and had it on hand, and had other materials on hand purchased for the same purpose, all of which would have been less valuable in their hands if they had not obtained the contract and been permitted to go on with the manufacture of the article. It struck me, Mr. President, as being one of those hard bargains from which equity ordinarily relieves a contractor.

But this written contract, as I remarked before—and here is my principal point—was not the contract into which the Sayleses had entered, and it was one to which they ought not to have been held.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill; asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. G. S. ORTH of Indiana, Mr. G. W. SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, and Mr. S. B. AXTELL of California, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 467) to confirm an entry of land of Moses F. Shinn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 968) authorizing certain banks named therein to change their names;

A bill (H. R. No. 273) to amend the act of April 10, 1806, for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 424) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men";

A bill (H. R. No. 1280) for the relief of Lieutenant Leonidas Smith, late of twenty-second regiment Indiana volunteer infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1823) for the relief of Walter D. Plowden;

A bill (H. R. No. 1489) granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society;

A bill (H. R. No. 1868) for the relief of H. A. White;

A bill (H. R. No. 1872) providing for the payment of Captain Goldman Bryson's mounted company; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1878) for the relief of George W. Short.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC EXPENSES.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, further disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion, by Mr. HOWE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the said bill, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conference on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

O. N. CUTLER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 591.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (S. No. 591) for the relief of O. N. Cutler was resumed as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $50,000 to O. N. Cutler, in full compensation for two hundred and sixty-eight bales of cotton seized by order of General Ulysses S. Grant, at Lake Providence, Louisiana, the property of Cutler, and used for military purposes in equipping the steamer Tigress for running the blockade of the Mississippi river, at Vicksburg, in the month of April, 1863, and destroyed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this involves the principle that was so much discussed in the case of Miss Sue Murphey. If it does it had better be laid over.

Mr. HOWE. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. HOWE on the 6th of July, 1868:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of O. N. Cutler, have examined the same, and submit the following as their report:

On the 5th day of March, 1863, one William C. Wagley made a written contract with John G. Klinek, assistant quartermaster, for the picking, ginning, and baling of cotton then growing on the lands about Lake Providence, in the State of Louisiana, which had been abandoned by the rebel owners and occupants, and then lately brought within permanent Union lines by the advance and occupancy of the Federal forces.

This contract was approved by Major General McPherson, commanding that district.

By the terms of the contract Wagley was to gather, gin, bale, and deliver at a certain point of shipment certain unpicked and abandoned cotton in and about Lake Providence at his own expense. This cotton, when so picked, ginned, and baled and delivered, was to be equally divided, and the Government to have one half and Wagley the other half, and Wagley to have the privilege of shipping his cotton to Memphis, Tennessee, on Government transports, he paying freight therefor.

On the 3d day of April, the same year, after having picked, ginned, and baled a considerable quantity of cotton under the contract, Mr. Wagley assigned his interest in the contract to Mr. O. N. Cutler, the claimant in this case, then a citizen of Hannibal, Missouri, who thereafter prosecuted the work, and a large amount of cotton was delivered under the contract at Lake Providence, and there divided, an officer of the Government taking charge of the one half belonging to the Government, and assigning to said Cutler the other half.

While this cotton was lying at Lake Providence awaiting transportation to Memphis General Grant required transportation for his army across the Mississippi river, below Vicksburg. To furnish this it was necessary to run steamboats through the blockade at Vicksburg. To run this blockade it was necessary to so furnish the boats as to protect, as far as possible, their machinery from destruction by the enemy's fire; and by General Grant's order his quartermaster took Cutler's cotton, and with it equipped the steamer Tigress to run that blockade. The Tigress and her equipment of cotton were lost on the voyage.

The amount of claimant's cotton so taken and used is shown by Captain B. F. Reno, assistant quartermaster, the officer who seized it under General Grant's order, to have been two hundred and sixty-eight bales.

The weight of the bales is not clearly proven. The claimant states his accounts as two hundred and sixty-eight bales weighing one hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred pounds, being four hundred and twenty-five pounds to the bale, and he puts it at twenty-five cents per pound, amounting to $82,645.

The original contractor, Wagley, was a citizen of Illinois, employed in this enterprise under the inducement held out by our authorities and the cotton was the price paid for his labor and risks. The claimant and assignee was then a loyal citizen of Hannibal, Missouri, took the contract off Wagley's hands, and completed the work.

The Government employed them to do the work, paid them for it, and before they could remove the proceeds of their labor and convert it it was seized by the Government for military purposes and destroyed.

It seems to your committee to be a case of private property taken for public use, freed from the complications and questions ordinarily attending claims for the use and destruction of property in an enemy's country in time of war, and should be paid for.

Your committee have had some difficulty in fixing the value of the cotton, but have agreed to report the accompanying bill appropriating $50,000, and to recommend its passage.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am opposed to all these bills in which the committees of the Senate attempt on ex parte evidence before them to fix values. Here is the large amount of $50,000; and so far as we are informed this amount is fixed on papers presented by the claimant to the committee. It seems to me very strange if this cotton was taken for the purposes of the Army that there was no appraisal made at the time of the amount, no receipt given for it, no statement made contemporaneous with the transaction of the quantity of cotton appropriated. That is a very singular fact. Ordinarily when property is taken either by the quartermaster's department or by their authority under military orders there is some ascertainment of the amount so taken; at all events of the amount, even if the value should not be ascertained. Now, there is another singular thing on the face of this claim; and that is that fifty or sixty thousand dollars' worth of cotton was taken for the purpose of protecting the machinery of a single steamer, so far as we can ascertain from the report which has been read. The report must be inaccurate or the thing upon its very face must be absurd. If the chairman of the committee has any explanation to make I will give way to him.

At all events where large amounts are involved, where there has been no Government survey or appraisalment of the property, I think it ought to be a rule that the subject should be sent to the Court of Claims. If the claim is to be recognized and paid bills ought to be drawn providing for the payment of the claim and referring it to the Court of Claims and ascertaining in the regular manner the amount of injury which the party has sustained, the value of the property taken, and possibly under some circumstances where there is doubt as to the facts an ascertainment also by that court of the liability of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On hearing the report read I do not see that it involves the Sue Murphey question at all; and if the facts reported are correct I confess I do not see how we can avoid paying the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think this bill had better pass now. It is a large sum of money, and it grows out of one of the cotton speculations during the war. It seems to have been a contract between a quartermaster and a man named Wagley, by which certain cotton that was claimed to have been abandoned was to be ginned and baled and they were to share it. If the cotton was abandoned cotton under the law it belonged, I suppose, to the Government. This man did not own this cotton. There was no way for him to become the owner of this cotton; he never bought it. It was a speculation by him without investment, and when it was taken to the banks of the river General Grant used it, it seems, for lining one of his boats; and I do not believe it took any such quantity of cotton to line the boat. The committee have been imposed upon in some way. The report says that on the 5th of March, 1863, Wagley made a written contract with Clinck, a quartermaster, for picking, ginning, and baling certain abandoned cotton. By the terms of the contract Wagley was to gather, gin, bale, and deliver at certain points of shipment certain abandoned cotton in and about Lake Providence at his own expense. It was his share, I suppose, which was taken to line the boat. While it is so difficult to get claims through the House or the Senate in favor of parties who have made advances to feed and clothe the soldiers during the war I do not think we ought to be in haste to pass one of the cotton speculation cases. This man seems to have been an adventurer down there, taking his chances of getting cotton that did not belong to him; that he did not pay for except as he gathered it and packed it and ginned it. That is all the pay he was to make out of it. I do not think we ought to pass the bill; but I am not going to spend any time in discussing it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It strikes me that my honorable friend from Indiana has rather a queer notion of equity. Had the Government a right to this cotton? The Government claimed the right to take it under a law passed by Congress as abandoned property. It had no means to avail itself of the property unless it should be picked and ginned and prepared for market. It seized it, as it had a right to do, as abandoned rebel property. Then, in order to make it available, the Government contracts with a man that he shall do the necessary labor in order to enable the Government to avail itself of the property thus seized; that he shall take it and gin it and bale it and put it in order for the purpose of enabling the Government to get something out of it; and they make a contract that for doing that work he shall have one half and the Government the other half.

The Senator calls him an adventurer. The report says that he is a loyal citizen of the State of Illinois. He assigned his contract to Mr. Cutler, well known as a loyal citizen and a man of respectability in the State of Missouri. I happen to know him myself; and the way I became acquainted with him was this: on the very highest recommendations I appointed him a special agent of the Department under the law to make purchase of cotton at New Orleans, and he was as good and faithful and valuable an officer as was in the employ of the Department during that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. When I was in the Treasury, after this occurrence. He is a man of the highest respectability and a man of capacity. He took this contract and he did the necessary work; he picked the cotton, he ginned it, he baled it, and he made it possible for the Government to receive something out of it. The Government and he then divided it according to the contract. The Government took its share and availed itself of it and sold it, giving him his share. After giving him his share, he being in possession of it, the Government needing it for its own purposes seized it and put it on board a vessel, and that vessel was sunk. Now, to carry out the idea that under these circumstances, he being the man who enabled the Government to get the other half, the Government now shall not pay him for his half which they delivered to him and which they took from him by force for their own purposes, is setting up a rule of justice and equity such as I never heard of before.

A word as to the amount. The price claimed is twenty-five cents a pound. The number of bales is certified to by an officer of the Government, and in order to make sure that they do not give too much the committee deduct the amount of $12,500 from what it would come to on the statement made to the committee, and that is said to be so uncertain that it ought not to be done. Mr. President, it certainly must strike any man who looks at it calmly and without prejudice that a clearer case could not possibly be stated of a righteous claim against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. I will simply state, on the question of damages, the committee were guided in fixing the value of the cotton by the testimony, which seemed quite satisfactory, laid before them of the value of the cotton at Cincinnati and of the cost of transportation from Vicksburg to Cincinnati, and we deducted a little from that, according to my recollection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At this session there was a bill before the Judiciary Committee extending the limitation for two years within which proceedings might be instituted by parties whose cotton was taken by public officers. The Judiciary Committee refused to recommend the passage of the bill upon the ground that there ought to be an end to such claims; that there had been sufficient time for the parties to assert their rights under existing laws.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say to the Senator from Indiana that there is no existing law that I know of under which this claimant could have sued for this cotton. Cotton which was taken and turned over to the Treasury Department and sold, and the proceeds put in the Treasury, the law authorized loyal persons to sue and recover the money for. This was not sold, it was not turned over to the Treasury Department, and I know of no law which would authorize this man to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not going to say that this case would come within that law. I was going to say, however, that the sentiment, the opinion of that committee upon proceedings for the recovery of cotton claims so long after the cotton had been taken had been expressed in rejecting that bill. This is no more meritorious—clearly not—than where property of a citizen was taken and sold and the money turned over to the Treasury; it is not a stronger case certainly, and the Judiciary Committee refused to approve a bill to extend the time within which parties might bring their suits in such cases. This is a case that could have been brought, as I suppose, in the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not see why not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They only have jurisdiction over contracts aside from the cotton statute.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is a claim for property taken and used by the Government. There is an implied contract that it shall be paid for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The statute which gives jurisdiction to the Court of Claims only allows them to proceed upon contracts. My friend from Indiana will not assert, I take it, that where property is taken by vis major, as lawyers call it, any contract can be implied unless the property is converted into money, when you can sue for money had and received.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But there was a contract in this case between this man and the quartermaster that he was to have half the cotton.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was executed and the property was divided and his half was turned over to him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And his half was to be transported, was it not? I ask the Senator from Maine if under his contract his part was not to be transported?

Mr. FESSENDEN. He had a right to have it transported upon Government boats, but the Government was under no obligation to take it and transport it for him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Government instead of transporting his portion of the cotton used it. There is a contract. What sort of a contract it is, whether a very good one or a very shabby one, I will not undertake to discuss; but that it has the forms of a contract, and that this man's loss occurred before all the terms of that contract were fully complied with, appears plain enough, because it was to be carried for him and delivered to him at some other point. I do not think it is a safe bill to pass, but I shall content myself with voting against it.

Mr. WARNER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims what State Mr. Wagley was a resident of at the time he made this contract.

Mr. HOWE. I have forgotten.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The report says Illinois.

Mr. HOWE. The report states that Mr. Wagley was from Illinois.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Rice, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Nye, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morton, Norton, and Ross—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Kellogg, McDonald, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Whyte, and Yates—32.

So the bill was passed.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the House recede from their amendments and agree to the resolution of the Senate with an amendment, as follows: in section one, line two, strike out the words "and hold office;" and the Senate agree to the same.

W. M. STEWART,
ROSCOE CONKLING,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
JOHN A. BINGHAM,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the report be made the special order at a quarter past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the proposition? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition is to make the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the constitutional amendment the special order for to-morrow at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It would be better to say one o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. I will say half past twelve.

Mr. HENDRICKS. You had better say one, and all will be here.

Mr. STEWART. I want to make it the special order for half past twelve.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the motion by saying one o'clock instead of half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. I expect to get a vote before one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The longest time will be put first; and the question is on making this report the special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to make it the special order for half past twelve.

The question being put; there were, on a division—ayes 24, noes 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEWART. We shall have to have the yeas and nays to get a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a quorum here. I ask that there be another division.

Mr. STEWART. There will be a quorum if all will vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make one remark. I have no objection to making this the order at one o'clock to-morrow, by which time the Senate will be full.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to antagonize it against the regular business of the day.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not think it will be debated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to make the report of the committee of conference the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. STEWART. I will modify my motion and say one o'clock.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The call for a division is withdrawn on that motion. There is no objection to fixing one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

CENSUS OF 1860.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 614.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 614) to pay loyal citizens in the States lately in rebellion for service in taking the United States census of 1860 was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claims of loyal citizens in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia, for services rendered as United States marshals and their assistants in taking the eighth census in the year 1860, may be paid out of any unexpended balance of any moneys hitherto appropriated for the payment of United States marshals and their assistants for services rendered in taking the eighth census in the year 1860; but no part of any such balance is to be paid to or on account of any claimant who participated in the late rebellion or gave to it aid or comfort.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who is to decide who was a loyal citizen under this bill; who is to be the judge?

Mr. HOWE. The same tribunal passes upon the question that settles the other marshals' accounts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who is that?

Mr. HOWE. I do not know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that bill had better be thought of a little. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. STEWART.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 35.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 35) for the relief of John F. Stewart, which proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to pay him the full amount of pay and emoluments as second lieutenant of company A, fourth United States volunteers, from July 22, 1865, to June 19, 1866, the date of the muster-out of his company.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That bill was reported back by me with a recommendation that it should not pass; there is a printed report which, if it is desired, can be read.

Mr. HOWE. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was disagreed to.

COOLEY AND BOSWELL.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims if it was not a bill for the benefit of Stewart Barnes he intended to call up?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish he would propose it.

Mr. HOWE. I will presently. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 163.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 163) for the relief of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that the amount of mail matter carried over routes Nos. 8293 and 3304 from Washington city, in the District of Columbia, to Poolesville, in the State of Maryland, during some portion of the time under the contracts for carrying the mails thereon from July 1, 1860, to June 30, 1864, greatly exceeded any anticipated quantity of mails to be carried over those routes at the time the contracts were made, on account of the large number of troops stationed at Poolesville and vicinity, and which could not have been foreseen by the contractors; and it therefore purposes to empower the Postmaster General to examine and adjust the claims of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell, who were contractors, respectively, for carrying the mails upon the routes named during that period, and to award them such compensation for carrying the increased bulk of mail matter under those contracts as may seem to him just and proper, not to exceed the sum of $1,200 to either.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BARTHOLOMEW COUNTY SOCIETY.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 185.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society, in the State of Indiana. The bill proposes to pay to the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society, in the State of Indiana, for damages done to the grounds, buildings, fences, trees, and shrubbery of said society, while the same were used as a military encampment or rendezvous for the organization of the tenth regiment of Indiana cavalry and other regiments, the sum of $2,000, in full satisfaction for all claims of the society against the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. The report is adverse, and I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA TURNPIKE COMPANY.

Mr. HOWE. I move the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 73) for the relief of the Columbia Turnpike Company for use and occupation of their road during the late rebellion.

The motion was agreed to.

RICE AND NOTEWARE.

Mr. HOWE. I move the indefinite postponement of Senate bill No. 257, for the relief of Clement T. Rice and Chauncey N. Noteware, late register and receiver at Carson City, Nevada.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN JAMES KELLY.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 928.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 928) for the relief of Captain James Kelly was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to James Kelly, captain of the thirty-fourth United States infantry, of the full pay of a captain from the 24th day of June, 1864, to the 31st of October, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I ought to say that while I asked the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill, I am not in favor of its passage. It was not reported by me; it was reported, however, by a majority of the committee. I will state briefly that it is to pay the salary of an officer who was dismissed from the Army wrongfully and subsequently restored, to pay him his salary during the time of the dismissal, during the time he was out of service. I am entirely satisfied that the dismissal was wrong; the Department was satisfied of that, and restored him to his command; but he was out of the service for some two or three years, I think; and this bill is to pay him his salary during that time. I could not agree with the majority of the committee.

Mr. WILLEY. It is a matter of indifference to me whether the Senate pass the bill. This was a gallant officer of the celebrated Irish brigade, who was detailed for recruiting service in consequence of severe wounds received in the battle of Antietam. By some kind of oversight he was mustered out of service without any trial and without his knowledge. He continued drawing his pay as a lieutenant colonel, and was addressed and treated as a lieutenant colonel after being mustered out of service without his knowledge; and for so doing, when it was found out, he was dismissed the service without trial and without his knowledge. On coming to Washington and making the facts known to the Department he was reinstated with his commission as captain, dating back to the date of his dismissal from the service, fully acknowledging that he had been improperly removed. The evidence shows that he had been so, and was a brave and gallant officer.

The bill makes provision for his payment, not for the time he was out of service, but from the time of his wrongful dismissal to the date of the order restoring him, during which time it is in proof that he was in Washington taking the necessary means to redress his grievances, ready and willing at all times to render service, and asking to be allowed to do it, at least a good portion of that time. For a portion of that time he was actually in service serving the country after he had been dismissed, the order for his dismissal not having been served upon him for a considerable length of time. Under these circumstances, a gallant officer having been wrongfully dismissed and put to the trouble of coming to Washington to have himself restored, and being restored and the dismissing power being in error upon its own acknowledgment, and he having been ready and willing to serve the country, a majority of the committee thought he ought to have the pay of a captain just the same as if he had been in service; and that is the whole case.

Here was a brave and gallant officer, furnishing as may be seen in the record the highest testimonials of gallantry, and who was wounded almost to the death. If it is the opinion of the Senate that he should not be paid for the time of his wrongful dismissal, when he was engaged in correcting the error and having himself restored to credit and to the ranks of the Army, they will say so. That is all there is in the case. He was taken out of the regular service for his courage and appointed a lieutenant colonel of volunteers. He was a captain in the regular Army, and was taken out of the regular Army and made lieutenant colonel in the volunteer service, and being wounded at the battle of Antietam, he was detailed for recruiting service in Michigan. While there, without any knowledge or notification on his part, he was mustered out of the service, and was subsequently dismissed the service, without any notification or trial. He served the country after his dismissal; in point of fact, gallantly in the South for some time. Because he drew his lieutenant colonel's pay after being mustered out of service up to the time of his dismissal, not being notified of his muster-out, he was dismissed the service, and then was put to the trouble of coming to Washington to reinstate himself. The error of the Government was acknowledged; he was reinstated to his position as captain in the regular Army, and as soon as a vacancy occurred he went back again into the service. He asks compensation only from the time of his dismissal up to the time he was reinstated; not from the time of his reinstatement up to the time when a vacancy occurred when he went back into the service. I think it is due that this gallant officer should be paid up for that time. It is a matter for the Senate to decide.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOWE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Nye, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Welch, and Willey—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howe, McCroery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Trumbull, and Williams—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Drake, Ferry, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, McDonald, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Warner, Whyte, Wilson, and Yates—28.

So the bill was passed.

STEWART BARNES.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 958, a bill for the relief of Blanton Duncan.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator will not press that motion for a little while yet.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is a private bill reported by me from the Judiciary Committee which I have tried for a number of days to get up.

Mr. CONKLING. Was not this evening set apart for bills from the Committee on Claims? If it was not, there are two private bills on the table that I should like to call up that came from the Post Office Committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to know how that is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The evening was set aside for reports from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it was for private claims generally.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 972. I must have unanimous consent, because it was reported to-day.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 972) for the benefit of Stewart Barnes was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites in its preamble that Stewart Barnes, late captain and assistant quartermaster in the United States Army, Connecticut volunteers, had his office at Plymouth, North Carolina, when it was captured by the rebels, with a large quantity of quartermaster stores, for which he has received credit by the proper authority, and the committee being satisfied that there was captured at the same time in the office of Barnes the sum of $674 72, money of the United States, the bill directs that the proper officers of the Government, in the settlement of the accounts of Barnes, shall credit him with the sum of $674 72.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That would be rather a queer bill on the statute-book. It talks about "the committee." One looking at the statute-book will not know what committee is meant. It says "the committee" is satisfied that the claim is right. I suggest that there be some change of phraseology in the preamble.

Mr. HOWE. Let the bill be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I think it should be amended. I move to strike out the preamble and make the proper correction in the phraseology. I move that the bill be amended so as to read:

That the proper accounting officers of the Government, in the settlement of the accounts of Stewart Barnes, do credit him with the sum of $674 72, being the amount of money captured by the rebels while in his custody and charged to him on the books of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator state whether or not Mr. Barnes received this money from the United States and was charged with it?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; he stands charged with it on the books. He cannot get his pay because of the difficulty in settling his money accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF DEPUTY COLLECTORS.

Mr. CATTELL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors and assessors having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same. They further agree and recommend that the title be changed, so as to read: "An act to allow deputy collectors of internal revenue acting as collectors the pay of collectors, and for other purposes."

ALEXANDER G. CATTELL,
WILLARD WARNER,
J. S. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
LEONARD MYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CATTELL. I will simply say that the bill stands precisely as it passed the Senate.

The report was concurred in.

ELLEN SIMMS.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 924.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 924) for the relief of Ellen Simms was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to refer the claim of Ellen Simms against the estate of York Williams, late deceased, for boarding and nursing him during his last illness, and for personal expenses and physician's bills paid by her, to the Second Comptroller, to be audited and settled by him, and to provide for paying to her such sum as the Comptroller shall find justly due to her on account of her claim, but the total amount so paid to her is not to exceed the sum of $300.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear the Senator state why the United States should pay Miss Simms for taking care of Mr. Williams.

Mr. WILLEY. This is an old woman ninety years of age, living in Baltimore—a colored woman. There was a soldier named York Williams who went out of the service in the spring of 1865 very much disordered. He had a loathsome disease; he had no friends to take care of him. This old lady was distantly related to him. York Williams applied to the old lady to take him in and nurse him, promising that he would pay so much per week out of his back pay and bounty when they should be received by him. She did take him in and nursed him until he died, making a considerable account before he died for board; and also she paid his physician's bills and his funeral expenses. Application was made to the Freedmen's Bureau by this old lady for payment. There was about forty-nine dollars back pay, which the Freedmen's Bureau paid to her; but a certificate for the bounty, it seems, had been issued a little while after the death of York Williams, and it was decided by the Comptroller that this money was not subject to administration, and that it reverted to the Government. If he had lived a little longer he could have received the bounty; and he would, under the contract—which is pretty clearly proven—have been bound to pay the old lady this bounty, as far as it extended, for the expenses of nursing him and boarding him and the physician's bills which she paid for him. The Committee on Claims thought it was a hard case that this old lady should not receive anything for her services to him; and they reported the bill accordingly providing that the matter be referred to the Second Comptroller, who, upon proper proof such as shall convince him, is to pay the amount that is due to the old lady for nursing York Williams, provided that sum does not exceed $200, the amount of the bounty. That is all there is of it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MATHILDA VICTOR.

Mr. WILLEY. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 875.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 875) for the relief of Mathilda Victor was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Mathilda Victor of $5,000 in full satisfaction of all her claims for use of and damages done to certain property and the appurtenances thereunto belonging to her, situate in the town of Baton Rouge, in the State of Louisiana, and known as St. Mary's Female Academy, by the United States military forces in the years 1863–64.

Mr. WILLEY. I suppose this bill will require some explanation. There is a printed report with the bill, a pretty long report, which gives the whole history of the case. I ask that it be read.

Mr. HOWARD. I hardly think it necessary to read the report in that case. Unless the Senator presses it I hope the reading will be dispensed with. I apprehend the Senate understand the merits of this case very well. I certainly do, for one.

Mr. WILLEY. I do not desire that the report should be read unless the reading is called for.

Mr. HOWARD. I think it a most meritorious claim.

Mr. COLE. The Senator who reports it ought to give some explanation of it. My own judgment is that the bill is too large as reported.

Mr. HOWE. I am opposed to the payment of this sum of money myself, and I will state in a word the point upon which I oppose it. This lady lived in Louisiana. There is no question but that she was an ardent friend of the United States—no question in my mind, and I believe none in the mind of any one. She owned a school-house there, and she had been a teacher. Our troops took possession of her property, and they found it necessary to destroy one of the buildings to give a range to their guns. Another building was used for quarters. Rent was paid, but I believe that it is alleged that not enough was paid. The point in the case upon which I am not satisfied is this: under other circumstances I should be in favor of paying everything that she lost; but the property that this bill proposes to pay for is property which was destroyed by the Government in the prosecution of the war, and not property which the Government took for its use. So far as we used her property I have no doubt we ought to pay for it, as I thought we ought to pay for property that we took in Decatur; but this bill proposes to pay not merely for property used, but for property destroyed as a necessary incident of the war. It is on that point that I differ with the committee. I think she is a very deserving lady, and if the Government was prepared to meet its obligations to all loyal people I think the Government should meet its obligations to her.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator from California thinks that this sum is too large. I think it is very much too small. The Senator from Wisconsin has said that there can be no question in regard to this lady's loyalty. That is a matter settled beyond controversy. She was in 1863, not in the beginning of the war, but in medias res, the owner of a very handsome property at Baton Rouge, in Louisiana—a female seminary. In that year that property was taken possession of. It was used first as a hospital and at different times as a hospital for United States troops. It was then used for several months as a place for contrabands, where the United States authorities placed contrabands and kept them; and the latter part of the time it was used as a stable for horses. Two military commissions were appointed for the purpose of examining into the rental value of this property, and also to ascertain the damages done in the use of it by the United States authorities. Before the finding of the award of the first commission had been thoroughly consummated the events of the times carried the troops and authorities away, and it became necessary to institute another commission. Another commission was thereupon appointed, Mr. WASHBURN, now a member of the House, being at the head of that commission, and I do not know that I can state more succinctly the merits of this case than by reading their finding. After a personal examination of the premises, and after a careful investigation of the testimony which is among the papers, they conclude their report as follows:

There being no further evidence to introduce the commissioners then proceeded to deliberate upon the facts as herein set forth, and to determine upon the several points in question as directed in the special orders hereto prefixed; and having considered and deliberated upon all the evidence adduced, and after a careful examination and inspection of the premises and the property in question, for which Miss Mathilda Victor claims damages from the United States, the commission has determined upon the following conclusions, namely:

1. That the claimant, Miss Mathilda Victor, is the legal owner of the property known as the St. Mary's Female Academy and the grounds thereto belonging, situated in the town of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and bounded north by private land, east by St. Mary's street, south by North street, and west by St. Hypolyte street; also, the ground situated on the westside of the aforesaid piece, bounded north by private lands, east by St. Hypolyte street, south by North street, and west by the United States lands, as set forth in the copy of the warrant deed hereto attached and marked A; also, a cottage house, situated on the last-described land at the time the town of Baton Rouge was occupied by the United States forces in June, 1862. Provided, That there is a mortgage or lien on said property or lands to the amount of $3,240, together with the interest thereon at eight per cent.

2. That previous to the rebellion the academy building and cottage building were in good condition, and that there were fine improvements upon the grounds thereto belonging, and that the total value of the said property, exclusive of the land, amounted to about fifteen thousand five hundred dollars.

3. That during the rebel occupation of Baton Rouge the academy buildings and the grounds were occupied for educational purposes till the month of May, (27th day,) 1862, when the United States forces took possession of the town; and during such rebel occupation (from August to December, 1862) the academy building was occupied in part as a dwelling by private parties for the period of three weeks, more or less, and that the same stood vacant for the balance of the time.

4. That by the authority of Brigadier General Williams the academy building was occupied in part as a hospital for United States troops in the months of June, July, and August, 1862, and that by the authority of the commanding officer or officers respectively of the United States troops at the post of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, the said academy buildings were occupied as quarters for "contrabands" or negroes from the month of December, 1862, or January, 1863, for a period of more than one year, when they were vacated by the "contrabands," and were left exposed to destruction from the vandal hands of negroes and from the troops, or temporarily occupied by the United States troops as quarters.

5. That rent is due from the United States for the academy buildings for the period of sixteen months.

That is up to the time of this report. The evidence further shows that after the date of this report it was occupied as stabling for the United States troops for an additional period of about four months.

6. That the amount due from the United States for rent is $2,500.

7. That all the academy buildings and the cottage house and the many improvements upon the grounds surrounding and thereto belonging have been damaged to the extent of almost total destruction by the United States military authorities and by the United States troops and "contrabands" without authority, and by other circumstances consequent upon the state of war and the occupation of rebel territory.

8. That the United States Government or its officers are responsible for damages done to the said property of Miss Mathilda Victor in and for the following amount, namely:

For destruction of cottage house on the corner of Hypolyte and North streets, and out-houses, fences, and other improvements thereto belonging, $2,400.

For damage to and destruction of the academy building, and the out-houses, fences, shrubbery, and other improvements appertaining thereto, $11,600.

Recapitulation.

Amount due from the United States for rent.	$2,500
Amount due from the United States for destruction of the cottage building, &c., by fire.	2,400
Amount due from the United States for damages to and destruction of the academy building, improvements, &c.	11,600

Total amount of rent and damages due from the United States.....$16,500

And finally, the commission concludes that the larger portion of the damages done to the academy buildings or premises has been inflicted since September, 1863, when the former commission appointed to investigate the same case submitted a report upon the same, which report, indorsed by the commanding general of the department of the Gulf, is hereto attached and marked B.

And it further appears from an order, a copy of which is hereto attached and marked C, issued by Major General N. P. BANKS, commanding department of the Gulf, that the claimant, Miss Victor, has already received from the quartermaster's department the payment of the sum of $1,500 on account of her said claims against the Government. The commission therefore recommends that this payment of $1,500 be deducted from the final payment of the said claims as herein set forth.

The commission then adjourned sine die.

H. D. WASHBURN,

Colonel Eighth Indiana Volunteers,

President of Commission.

BENJAMIN F. HAYS,

Lieutenant Colonel First Indiana Artillery.

S. E. ARMSTRONG, Captain First Indiana Artillery Volunteers, Recorder of Commission.

The finding of the commission is thus indorsed:

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA, June 1, 1864.

Respectfully forwarded. After a careful examination of the evidence, I am satisfied that the finding of the commission is right, and that the allowance of the claims would be a simple act of justice to a meritorious and truly loyal and patriotic lady.

W. P. BENTON,

Brigadier General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS POST AND DISTRICT OF BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA, June 2, 1864.

I have read with attention and care the evidence in the foregoing case, and have made a personal examination of the property upon which the claim for damages is founded. I am also informed, of facts, outside of the record, which are cumulative and add strength to the equity of the case. I strongly urge favorable action as due to a woman who has been, through good and evil report, a fast and unflinching friend of the Government under circumstances where interest and the promptings of selfishness would have constrained to a contrary line of conduct.

FITZ HENRY WARREN,

Brigadier General Commanding.

DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,

June 15, 1864.

The foregoing proceedings of the military commission have been examined and hereby approved.

N. P. BANKS,

Major General Commanding.

In addition to that, as is shown by the testimony of Colonel Martindale among the papers, subsequent to this finding and to the execution of this commission, this property was occupied by the United States for stabling and other purposes nearly the term of four months; and he testifies further that such a use of such a property would be worth $500 a month.

Now observe, Mr. President, this finding of this military commission distinguished between what would be a reasonable rent and the damages to the property. In finding $2,500 rent due they did not include in that amount anything for the extraordinary character of the use of the property, necessarily leading to great damage to the property, because in a distinct and separate item they found the damages by themselves; so that in ascertaining what would be a fair rent they did not take into consideration the use. Everybody knows that for the purposes of a seminary and other ordinary purposes a proprietor of property would rent it for much less than he would rent it for the purpose of being occupied by troops or to be occupied as a stable or to be occupied by contrabands. In making up their estimate of the value of the rent for this time the commission did not take these things into consideration, because they found the damages in a distinct item.

The commission found $16,500 to be due to this lady for rent and damages, and in that they did not include the four months' additional occupation which took place after the finding of the commission. The Committee on Claims has whittled the thing down to the paltry sum of $5,000, for which no man who would have occupied that property would have rented it. If we are to make no other compensation we are in duty bound, if we are to pay any rent at all, to increase the rent which this commission found in consideration of the extraordinary use to which the property was applied since. In the estimating of that rent the commission did not take the extraordinary use to which it was applied into consideration, but found the value of the rent independent of any damages.

I say that this lady is entitled to more for rent, for the period of sixteen or twenty months during which time this property was occupied by United States troops than what she has already received and than what this bill gives her. It is an inadequate consideration; it is a paltry consideration; and I for one, as a member of the committee, was almost ashamed to be the organ of the committee to introduce to the Senate a report rendering to this loyal lady a consideration so paltry. Why, sir, she has the testimony here of Admiral Farragut and of various other distinguished officers who knew her. Admiral Farragut took her upon his vessel from the violence of her enemies, the violence of the enemies of the country, and carried her to New Orleans for safety, together with her sister; and he recommends in the strongest terms that Congress should do this loyal lady justice.

Now, sir, after this lady has been deprived of all her property; after we have destroyed a beautiful estate belonging to her; after we have broken up her business and turned her out penniless upon the charity of the world, when we come in here with a paltry bill giving her not one third of the amount to which she is entitled, we are met by the answer that it ought not to be allowed. If anything be allowed this amount is much too small. I hope the Senate will not hesitate one moment to vote this sum of only $5,000. It should be more. I would be willing to double it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I have looked into the claim of Miss Victor as carefully as I have been able, and I am satisfied that the bill presented to the Senate by the Committee on Claims ought to pass. If there be any fault it consists in the insufficiency of the sum to indemnify that lady for her losses. Gentlemen about me have inquired whether this be not exactly such a claim as that of Sue Murphey, which has become somewhat famous in the history of our discussions. I can assure them that there is very little if any analogy between the two claims. In the first place, as to Sue Murphey, she was a disloyal person, although she palmed herself off upon a committee of this body as being a loyal lady and based her claim upon that assumption, which since the discussions here has turned out to be a very false assumption indeed. Sue Murphey was a rebel at heart, a rebel in action, and belonging to a rebel family; and I have the best reason to suppose that the land which was conveyed to her and for which she asked compensation was transferred to her as a mere cover by a rebel owner for the purpose of protecting it against possible confiscation. At all events, the character of that claimant was very different from the character of Miss Victor. Miss Victor was a native of Pennsylvania. At an early day she removed to Ohio, and from Ohio emigrated to Louisiana and settled very near Baton Rouge, where she established a seminary and was engaged in the business of instructing young ladies. She from the beginning has been strictly loyal in word and in deed; in conviction, in sympathy, in action; and so far as loyalty is concerned, there can be no doubt whatever as to the character of the claimant.

She was not a mere neutral in politics. She did not merely remain at home inactive and indifferent apparently to the success of the one party or the other. She was active and energetic in what she said and did. She devoted her time to taking care of the sick and wounded Union soldiers. She showed her faith by her acts over and over again under circumstances of difficulty and trial such as would have discouraged and crushed an ordinary woman. Her loyalty was active, outspoken, courageous, and heroic from the beginning to the end. Her property was taken and much of it destroyed by the Union Army in the course of their operations. I was a little surprised, I must confess, to hear the Senator from Wisconsin say that the case of Miss Victor differed from the case of Miss Murphey in this, that the property in the case of Miss Victor was taken and destroyed by the Union Army in the regular course of the operations of the war. Was not that true also in the case of Miss Murphey? Certainly it was. The property of both these claimants was taken and destroyed in the regular operations of war.

Mr. HOWE. I had forgotten that I made any allusion to Miss Murphey's case.

Mr. HOWARD. You laid down a principle which would cover both.

Mr. HOWE. It would not be at all strange if I did. I have alluded to it several times before, [laughter,] but I did not this evening.

Mr. HOWARD. I am perfectly aware—

Mr. HOWE. I only want to remind my friend from Michigan that the only point on which I hesitated to recommend the payment of this claim was that the damage done for which this bill is reported is first for a building which was not used by the Government, but knocked to pieces to give range for our guns.

Mr. HOWARD. Would you refuse compensation on the ground of the necessity such as you describe? Would you refuse compensation because the necessities of war made it necessary to knock the claimant's building to pieces for the purpose of giving range to the guns?

Mr. HOWE. No; I do not think I would myself if I was to settle the law, but I understand the law to be settled that the Government is not to make good the ravages of war, although they touch your friends; and a great deal harsher doctrine than that was contended for, since I was born, on this floor and by that gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to have any discussion with the Senator respecting abstract principles. It is sufficient for me that this was a loyal woman; and superadded to her loyalty she performed acts useful and advantageous to the Government and the country, showing by her acts her devotion to the flag—a thing which Miss Murphey did not do.

Now, sir, whenever I find a case of this kind where, within the rebel country during the operations of war, a Union man or Union woman performed such acts of devotion to his or her Government as to leave his or her loyalty beyond all question, I am willing to render reasonable compensation; and this is what I have always said. I would make it an exceptional case. It does not come strictly within the rule of war; but because of such meritorious acts and such meritorious conduct I would reward it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The only difference that has been exhibited in this case has been, I believe, this: this is a sort of Sue Murphey case, junior, and whereas the Senator from Wisconsin was for Sue Murphey, senior, he is against Sue Murphey, junior, and my friend from Michigan, who was against Sue Murphey, senior, is for Sue Murphey, junior.

[Laughter.] I trust we may vote to postpone this question until to-morrow. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand from the honorable Senator from Vermont that the Senator from Michigan has taken the young lady, then.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

[Laughter.] Mr. DAVIS. Instead of the old one. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to say one word to my skillful and experienced critic from Vermont, who designates this case as a Sue Murphey case, junior, whereas the other case was a Sue Murphey case, senior. I have endeavored to shed the light which was necessary to convince his understanding that there was no analogy between the two cases. It is possible that I have failed, but I beg to repeat, that while Sue Murphey was a rebel, while she received the title of the property that was conveyed to her from rebel hands, while all her sympathies were with the rebellion and all her acts evinced her rebellious proclivities, the condition of Miss Victor was entirely the reverse, and instead of remaining even a neutral in the rebel territory she was engaged actively and constantly in rendering essential aid and assistance to the Union armies by assisting in taking care of the sick and wounded and defying the rebels. Now, sir, is this a case of Sue Murphey, senior? Mr. President, that scorn and that scoff, let me say to the honorable Senator from Vermont, is not to be received as argument. It can convince nobody.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Anthony] were not brought forward to testify that Sue Murphey was as loyal as he testifies now to the loyalty of Miss Victor?

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to answer that question, so far as one of the Senators alluded to is concerned?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I take great pleasure in informing my friend from Vermont that the Senator from Wisconsin was not brought forward to testify to any such assertion, and did not testify to it; but, on the contrary, said that he had serious doubts about the loyalty of Miss Murphey, and recommended that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims to investigate that question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But during the Senator's speech that testimony was introduced, as I understood it, by the Senator from Rhode Island, and various documents were read from officers to prove that she was loyal.

Mr. HOWE. A former Committee on Claims had examined the question of her loyalty, had become satisfied of it, and had reported that fact. It was not reported by the Committee on Claims of which I was chairman, but it was the committee of a former Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin—I think we understand this subject alike—whether the Sue Murphey case was not this, and argued on the assumption that she was loyal, and that the Government was called upon to pay for removing some of her buildings and occupying the lands in erecting fortifications? This is another case where the claimant is loyal but where the Government does not occupy her lands but destroys her building in order to make room for the play of artillery. I certainly think the Sue Murphey case is the stronger, altogether the stronger, on principle, of the two.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator from New Jersey

is utterly mistaken about this case. The bill as reported asks nothing at all for the property destroyed to make room for the play of artillery. It is for the use and occupancy of the property by the United States troops, &c. The principal ground of the argument which I endeavored to make was not to say one word about damages, but to show that the amount reported in this bill was not more than a fair rental value of this property, considering the purposes to which it was appropriated by the United States.

Mr. COLE. Then comes in the point I made at the outset, that the sum named in the bill is too large, because the amount charged for rent is only half the amount reported, or $2,500.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] satisfied my mind beyond all doubt that the claim of Miss Sue Murphey ought to have been allowed by the Senate, and to-night the honorable Senator from West Virginia and the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] have produced exactly the same deep conviction in my mind in relation to the claim of Miss Mathilda Victor. I think that the arguments of the gentlemen have irrefragably established the truth and justice of both claims, and they ought both to be allowed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I made a motion to postpone it until to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Make it an indefinite postponement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I make it indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. HOWE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As we are about to put ourselves on the record, I wish to see if I understand this case. I listened the other day with great interest to the conclusive argument of the honorable Senator from Michigan to show, not only by the laws of nations and of war, founded in justice and the nature of things, that a claim for the destruction of property in the course of warlike operations could not be entertained, but also to show that a claim in the nature of rent for use and occupation could not be maintained by a loyal claimant who resided at the time within the limits of military operations. He cited authorities; he appealed to reason; and as far as a complete legal argument can demonstrate anything he appeared to me to demonstrate, and the authorities that he referred to went to show, that cases of damage in the course of military operations were further on the other side of the line of recovery than cases of mere occupation which might be claimed to be in the nature of rent. It was on that ground or some other—I suppose that ground—that we recommitted that bill to the Committee on Claims.

Now I find him, considerably to my astonishment, maintaining a cause which is further off from the right of recovery than that of Miss Sue Murphey, assuming the loyalty of both ladies. Here, differing from the Murphey case, instead of the United States merely occupying property for the convenience of their operations after they had taken possession, it appears from the petition itself—I have not had time to read the whole of it—

And I now read from the petition:

"That she continued to occupy the said property as a school until the 27th day of May, 1862, when the buildings were damaged by shell and the school broken up by the bombardment of the town by the United States naval forces, commanded by Admiral D. G. Farragut, when she was compelled to leave."

It then proceeds to say—it is quite long, and I will not occupy time in reading the rest of it—that after bombarding her school-house and seminary and driving her out of town the conquerors took possession of it and used it, or some part of it; and that she has been paid down to a certain time for the rent proper under the direction of the officers of the Army; and now she claims additional rent in the nature of damages; that the board of survey, or whatever you call it in military operations, only fixed the rent upon the theory of rent as such; and that they failed to take into consideration the fact of the severe use, as the committee style it, to which the property was put; that is to say, it was put to the use of being a barracks for Admiral Farragut's men in bombarding the town, and it was cleared off to make range for their artillery when they got possession, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee.

I should be glad to know upon what principle it is that the honorable Senator from Michigan—and he always has some good distinction in his own mind, and I speak seriously for information—reconciles the claim, stated as this is in the petition, with the law that he so thoroughly demonstrated to my mind the other day. I pause for a reply.

Mr. HOWARD. I endeavored to state when I was up before the ground upon which I put this claim. First, I will repeat what the ground was not. It was not because this lady was at heart a loyal lady, but remained neutral and inactive during the war in her neighborhood. If that had been her attitude I could not vote for the claim. But instead of remaining neutral, inactive, utterly inefficient in respect to the cause of the Government, this lady was active, and devoted herself and rendered her services for the benefit of the Union-cause in a rebel country, thus incurring great risk and bringing upon herself great perplexity, great trouble, great difficulty, by her devotion to the flag of the country. And I say again that where I find a person who has actually rendered such services to the country, evinced by acts of devotion so decided and patriotic, I will, as a measure of generosity, not to say justice, make good the loss of such a person. The principles of the law of war which I insisted upon in regard to the case of Sue Murphey are undoubtedly the true principles, as general principles; but this, as I remarked before, is an exceptional case where the claimant has actually rendered important service and shown great devotion in the midst of great difficulties to the common cause. I put it, not upon the ground of law, not upon the ground of international law or right, but upon the ground of common justice and common gratitude to the claimant. I trust that the Senator does not now misunderstand me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand now that it is put upon the ground of a bounty, so to speak, on account of the eminent services that this lady rendered in support of the war. If it were put upon that ground in the bill, and it could be demonstrated that that ground was tenable in point of fact, it would present an entirely different question from what we have here; but the petition does not put it upon any such ground; the facts set out in the report do not put it on any such ground; the report of the committee, as far as I have had time to read it, does not put it upon any such ground; and it is only, as it seems to me, the opinion, the sentiment of good will, of admiration for patriotism which is embosomed in my friend from Michigan that induces him to put it upon any such ground. If we had a distinct bill here for a bounty for services rendered by this lady in the southern States during the rebellion, and should investigate the facts and find that her services had been so extraordinary, so much greater than those of thousands of other Union people there, then it would be a question whether she ought to have a gratuity or a bounty given to her. But the only thing that appears in her petition is what I read before. She makes a claim against us, having been paid her rent, or the largest part of it at the time as rent, that the damages that were done to her property were of such an excessive and extraordinary nature, by being bombarded, that she is entitled to further compensation, which, as a matter of convenience and adroitness, she prefers to style "rent and damages."

Then, as to her service, it does appear here in the letter of a Mr. Elliott, a lieutenant colonel, as follows:

"Immediately after General Williams landed Miss Victor called on him and through me tendered the use of her academy for soldiers."

I do not think that was a very great stretch of benignity on the part of this lady, after we had to take the town through a battle and had marched in and the house, as she claims, had been badly knocked to pieces and her students had all gone. I do not think it was any great concession, I must say, on the part of this patriotic lady to tender the use of this conquered seminary to the commanding general who had just conquered it to let the soldiers come in and sleep over night. But then she did something else, it seems:

"I know of her house having been used for some weeks and her servant having done all the cooking for some dozen patients without any compensation."

If the committee will change this into a bill to pay Miss Victor the proper compensation for her servant having cooked for a dozen soldiers for some weeks, then it will be a fair subject for consideration. But all this—my friend from Michigan must pardon me for saying it as to everybody but himself—must be an afterthought. The petition does not pretend to put it upon any such ground. There is no fact upon which you can base it in this paper which would warrant putting it on any such ground. My friend goes very far in his sympathy for this lady, and she certainly has mine; and if it were my money, as some members of committees frequently say, and I had enough of it, I should be glad to pay her claim and everybody else's; but it is not; it is the people's money.

We have here a case on the report of the committee that is perfectly bare of the distinguishing features upon which it was attempted in the Murphey case to take that claim out of the acknowledged principles of law and justice relating to belligerent operations. This is flatly within the very authorities that my friend from Michigan read; and that he seems to concede, by changing the ground and attempting to put it upon the fact that she graciously permitted the soldiers to occupy this house in a conquered town and that her servant cooked for a dozen soldiers for some weeks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Stewart, Vickers, Williams, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Cragin, Davis, Fowler, Howard, McGuire, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Warner, Welch, Whyte, and Yates—38.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. NYE. I move that the absentees be sent for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SUNDY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2008) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-morrow, and from day to day until disposed of.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PETTIS. I rise to a privileged question. The Daily Globe, in the proceedings of day before yesterday, represents me as voting in the negative upon the passage of the bill to strengthen the public credit and to legalize gold contracts, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK.] I voted in the affirmative on that bill, and ask that the Journal be corrected if it records my vote as it is recorded in the Globe.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected, if there is any error in it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations desire to finish the deficiency appropriation bill, which was not completed last evening.

Mr. LAFLIN. I object.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the deficiency bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAFLIN. I will withdraw the objection if it is understood that I have the floor after the deficiency bill is finished.

Mr. CHANLER. There is no quorum here, and we will have a division on the question.

The SPEAKER. There can be no understanding as to the assignment of the floor.

Mr. LAFLIN. Then I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very much embarrassed in regard to privileged questions at this period of the session, but in the pressure of public business at the close of the session it is usual to give the appropriation bills priority, and if there is no objection the deficiency bill will be given priority to-day.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

PRINTING OF EVIDENCE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask to have printed the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs of officers of the Army in regard to the reduction of the Army and the accompanying report of the committee.

There was no objection; and the order to print was made.

Mr. KERR. I would ask the House to make an order that the evidence taken by the Committee on Roads and Canals, in reference to the navigation of the Ohio river, may be printed. It is very important.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to amend the postal laws, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage.

Mr. LAFLIN. I object.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERHAM. If the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency bill should prevail, what will become of the opportunity that the Committee on Invalid Pensions were expecting in this morning hour to make reports? We have some bills which we feel that it is absolutely necessary to pass before the adjournment, and we very much desire a little time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated some time since that in the great press of business before the House there would probably be no more morning hours except on Monday, when the morning hour is absolutely reserved by the rules against unanimous consent being asked, or a suspension of the rules. The House was acting under the operation of the previous question upon the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, which was postponed by unanimous consent to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to finish the deficiency bill.

Mr. PERHAM. I give notice that at some favorable opportunity I will endeavor to get the floor to have some time assigned for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. VAN TRUMP from the evening session of to-night on account of sickness.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now insist on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. PRICE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill for amendments.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of line one hundred and fifty-three:

To supply deficiency in the appropriation for lighting the Capitol and President's House, and the public grounds around them and around the executive offices, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MULLINS. I offer the following amendment:

For custom-house and post office building at Nashville, Tennessee, $20,000.

I desire to say a few words in addition to what I said last night in regard to the merits of this case. The Government is laying out of the use of $100,000 which was appropriated about fifteen years ago, and is paying in addition to the loss of that fund $1,500 annually as rent for a building for the post office, which is very illy fitted for that purpose. The ground there belonging to the Government is used as a common. The building material that was got together previous to the war has been wasted away measurably, and now is an auspicious time for the Government to provide for a suitable building at this point. A building for a custom-house and post office at Nashville is unmistakably needed, and the amount I propose to appropriate is far less than has been appropriated for a similar purpose at other places since this bill has been under consideration, or even for years past.

And is it possible that Tennessee is to stand here and no be ignored in this character and style for to other reason than because she is Tennessee? I can see no other reason for it. The argument is that the Department has not made a demand that this should be done. I will reply to that argument that in all human probability, as the parties stand now related to the property occupied and rented for the present post office business and all the Departments on one side of politics, you never will have a request for an appropriation there, because parties are interested in the renting of this property and are now possibly getting one hundred per cent. more from the Government than they could get from other parties.

This is not fit property for the business done or intended to be carried on by the Government there; it is only fit to be a drunken grocery. The lot that is paid for in part by the Government is one of the most eligible sites in the city. It is a point that all parties are satisfied with and will be satisfied with. I trust the appropriation will be made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There has been no estimate for the appropriation covered by this amendment. No Department of the Government asks for it. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. MULLINS; and it was not agreed to—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the four paragraphs under the heading "Post Office Department:—"

For construction of custom-house at St. Paul, Minnesota, $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that this is for the commencement of a new work.

Mr. WINDOM. It is not; it is estimated for as other custom-houses were for which we made appropriations last year. It stands upon precisely the same footing as did those that were voted in by the Committee of the Whole last night. I ask for but half the amount estimated for by the Department. This building is now under construction, and, as I have already stated, it is upon precisely the same basis as the amendments we adopted last night. I desire my amendment to stand with those already made or to fall with them.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This amendment is offered under the estimates of the Post Office Department. I suppose if the Committee of the Whole are to put it in this bill we ought to go back to where we started this morning and have all the amendments of this character grouped together.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me state why I did not put it in there.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that if any of these appropriations for buildings estimated for by the Department are adopted at this place they may be transferred to the part of the bill where similar amendments were inserted last night.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall object to that unless the gentleman will permit debate upon these amendments. Debate was closed upon the paragraph under consideration last night. Amendments offered to the paragraph now under consideration will be open to debate, while if they are offered to the other paragraph they cannot be debated.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If my request be acceded to all these amendments will be open to discussion just the same.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then I will not object. No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

The question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. WINDOM.

Mr. SCOFIELD. In relation to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] I will say that it stands upon the same footing as the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole last night. The Department estimated for a deficiency of $50,000. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that fifty per cent. of the estimate be appropriated, as was done in the other cases. Although I am opposed to all these amendments, if any of these amendments are to be adopted I suppose this should be.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend the amendment by decreasing the amount asked for to $10,000. I move this amendment for the purpose of saying that I hold in my hand the report of the supervising architect of all those buildings, from which it appears that for this custom-house at St. Paul, Minnesota, there is available of the amount appropriated in the annual appropriation bill of last year a sum of over twenty-seven thousand dollars not yet expended. That, I think, is a sufficient amount for the balance of this fiscal year.

Mr. WINDOM. Does the architect state that that is a sufficient amount for the balance of this year, or is it merely an inference of the gentleman?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The architect states that there was expended some fifty-seven thousand dollars, and that there remains unexpended the sum of twenty-seven thousand dollars and over.

Mr. WINDOM. What is the date of that report?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The date of the report is October 31, 1868.

Mr. WINDOM. This work is in precisely the same position as the others. There was a surplus at that time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill, it must be remembered, is a deficiency bill. It is not the annual appropriation bill. We made liberal appropriations for all these works last year; and as to all of them or nearly all of them there is a balance of appropriation yet unexpended. In no instance is there any suspension of work in consequence of the want of funds. On one or two of these custom-houses there has been a suspension of work for other causes, but no suspension for want of funds. In the case of the court-house at Springfield there is a balance unexpended; and for the court-house at Cairo, Illinois, for which we appropriated last night $25,000, there is an unexpended balance of over twenty-five thousand dollars—sufficient, I apprehend, for the continuation of the work. If it is necessary to appropriate for these works we can do so in the regular appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; but to add to the large appropriations made last year these that are now asked in this deficiency bill is not, it strikes me, required by any exigencies of the public service. I withdraw my amendment.

On the amendment of Mr. WINDOM there were—ayes 30, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WINDOM and Mr. BENJAMIN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AXTELL. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For constructing branch mint building at San Francisco, $125,000.

I desire to say to gentlemen of the committee that this appropriation stands upon precisely the same ground as the others that have been adopted both last night and to-day. The estimate for this work is $250,000. Since 1866 the site has been procured and the foundation has been laid, the stone is being quarried and the work is going on. We have still on hand some money that we are using. The supervising architect has estimated that $250,000 will be required for this year. But in accordance with the understanding arrived at in this House, that at this time we will not ask more than one half the estimated amounts for works of this kind, the object being that the works may not be discontinued and go to decay, I have named in the amendment $125,000, and I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

Let me add a few words as to the necessity of this appropriation. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, the mint at San Francisco coined $15,072,000, while during the same period the Mint at Philadelphia coined $5,998,137. I make this comparison for the purpose of showing the committee that our mint transacts a very large amount of business. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, there was refined in California bullion to the amount of $49,020,250, on which the tax paid to the Government was $294,121 50, while in Pennsylvania the amount of bullion refined was only $4,044,218, on which the tax paid to the Government was $29,265 31.

The building at present occupied as our mint is very small, being only sixty feet square. It was not originally constructed for a mint building. It is inconveniently situated upon a by street in a disagreeable and unwholesome neighborhood. But above all it is insufficient in size. We are compelled to hire for storage and for offices of the superintendent other buildings, some adjoining and some in different parts of the city, at an expense to the Government of $1,000 in gold monthly, or $12,000 per annum. This is not a matter that concerns more the citizens of San Francisco than the other citizens of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman from California [Mr. AXTELL] is correct in saying that the Department has made an estimate for an appropriation of $250,000 for this work to be inserted in the deficiency bill; and his amendment proposes an expenditure of only fifty per cent. of that sum. But if I correctly understand the facts of the case, this is not so meritorious an appropriation as those which have been voted, in or as several others estimated for but upon which no action has been taken. Last year an appropriation, I believe, of about three hundred thousand dollars was made for this purpose, and nothing has been done except to purchase a site. There may have been some steps taken toward the construction, but nothing of any account.

Mr. AXTELL. The necessary steps have been taken to lay the foundation; the stone work has commenced; contracts are being made. The necessity, however, remains for this appropriation.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I was not aware that much of anything had been done. Some contracts have been made and something done to get the stone upon the ground. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the appropriation last year, at all events, remains unexpended. Mr. AXTELL's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HULBURD. I move the following amendment:

For the construction of the custom-house at Ogdensburg, New York, $12,500.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I suppose if any one of these is adopted this one ought to be.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARDING demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARDING and Mr. HULBURD were appointed.

The committee were again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

War Department:
For regular supplies of the quartermaster's department, $2,500,000.

Mr. BURR. I move to reduce that appropriation to $500,000.

Mr. Chairman, we have an aggregate of between fourteen and fifteen million dollars appropriated to supply deficiencies in the appropriations made last year for the War Department. This appropriation is for the "regular" supplies of the quartermaster's department. Now, we can fairly assume that the necessity for these regular supplies was as apparent six months ago as it is to-day; and it strikes me as somewhat strange that this great deficiency of $2,500,000 in one item should be brought forward at this session after the protracted and animated debate last session on expenditures by the Government for the Army. I should like to have some explanation why we should have been persistently assured that the amounts in the regular appropriation bills would be sufficient to meet the necessary expenses after making a great reduction in the expenses of the War Department. I should like to know why that was so persistently asserted then, and the contrary position taken in this appropriation bill in appropriating $2,500,000 in this item for "regular supplies of the quartermaster's department?" Why is this, after the boasted intention to effect retrenchment and a reduction of expenditures? Unless some satisfactory reason is given for this I cannot vote for it.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. At the last session the House undertook to economize as far as possible, and it cut down the estimates of the Department, and among others it made a very large reduction in the estimates for the Army. Gentlemen will recollect that the reduction was very large, and that members upon the floor then prophesied that we would come back this session with a large deficiency bill. I think, however, that the Army has accommodated itself in a great measure to the appropriations made at the last session, and they would have brought their expenses within those appropriations if it had not been for the continuation of the Indian war. That war has been expensive, and particularly in the quartermaster's department. Except for that war and an increase in the Army, by raising a regiment of volunteers in Kansas and the large expense in cavalry, I think the Army would have come near keeping within the appropriations, although we had made them extraordinarily low. This is according to the estimates of the Department. The Committee on Appropriations have carefully examined this matter, first by a subcommittee and then by the whole committee, and it was deemed to be necessary.

Mr. BURR. Was not that Indian war then pending? Were we not then told that notwithstanding that war the appropriations then made would be sufficient? Yet we have this deficiency of over fourteen million dollars for the War Department. Is not that all true?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The Indian war continued much longer than was expected. It lasted longer than any one anticipated.

Mr. BURR. Was it because it was mismanaged on our part, or because of the superior strength of the savage enemy?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. It was because the enemy persisted.

Mr. BURR. That was unkind on the part of the enemy, but nevertheless I withdraw the amendment to allow the gentleman from Indiana to renew it.

Mr. CHANLER. I renew the amendment. I understand the gentleman to say that the reason that this enormous amount, some nineteen million dollars in the aggregate, is introduced in this deficiency bill is on account of the Indian war. Did I understand him correctly to say that that is the cause of the large increase?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. No, sir; you did not. What I said was, it is one of the causes.

Mr. CHANLER. Well, sir, I assert, and I challenge contradiction of the fact, that we have not had six thousand men in the field and actually engaged with the foe during this Indian war. If the gentleman will consult the General of the Army and the other generals in command of our forces in this war in regard to the matter I believe he will ascertain that the war has been a fiction from the beginning. It is not a war, except in the newspapers and telegrams, and unworthy of any such appropriation as this or of any considerable appropriation whatever. Sir, when the facts come to be known, the assertion made on this floor will be remembered by the American people that for the purpose of covering up a pretense of economy, carried out here in a protracted debate during several weeks on the appropriation bills, and recently passed by Congress for the Army, we have here in the deficiency appropriation bill an enormous amount brought in and applied directly to the Army; and one of the reasons for bringing it in is the prosecution of an Indian war which history will prove never existed. There are not now arrayed against this Government men enough to make a respectable skirmish. There are not men enough on the frontier fighting for the Government against the Indians to make a brigadier's detachment in the late war against the rebellion.

Now, I ask the gentleman to state the facts and figures in reply to the assertion I make. It will not answer to present any amount of falsehoods and call upon the over-taxed people of the country to sustain the fabric of those falsehoods by their toil and labor. I charge home upon the party in control of the Government to-day that this Indian war is a fiction, and in regard to its achievements very near a farce. The most distinguished act in this so-called war is the death of a poor Indian chief named Black Kettle, an avowed friend of the whites, an accepted and intimate companion of our officers in the field. I know this cannot be contradicted with any show of truth. And when he was shot it was in his own camp, where he had been accustomed to extend his hospitalities to officers of this Government. He was surrounded by his wife and children, brought up to respect this Government. These Indians were not marauders; they were not bringing upon the Government any expense whatever. They were shot in cold blood; but they were represented in the telegrams and newspaper dispatches as a war party, and now we are asked to appropriate nearly twenty million dollars to carry on this farce of an Indian war.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The statement of the gentleman from New York seems to me too extravagant to convince the judgment of the committee that this expenditure is not proper. I would agree that this war, like most Indian wars, has been excited by bad men and there was never much cause for it. I would also agree that like most Indian wars it is carried on very expensively compared with the result. But that the money appropriated has been extravagantly expended by the Army or any of its officers I am not satisfied. I looked over the report very carefully, and although I did see that bad men had stirred up the Indians to commit these depredations and that a great deal of money had been expended compared with the number of the enemy, yet it seemed to be a necessary result.

And I wish to say one thing more. When we made the appropriation last year, and made a very large reduction, and I think my friend from New York [Mr. CHANLER] was here and opposed it, I know there was a very large number of gentlemen who opposed any reduction in the appropriation, because they claimed that it was all needed and that this year we would come back with a deficiency bill. Well, we did make the appropriation too small I suppose, but in our efforts at great economy we have succeeded in obtaining a good deal of it, not as much as we hoped, but still we have reduced the expenditure by making this small appropriation. If the amount appropriated had been a larger one it would all have been expended, and they would have been here with a demand for a deficiency as large as this is. The smallness of the appropriations acted as a restraint on all the Departments, although they are forced now on account of the Indian war being so long protracted to ask for a pretty large deficiency.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For horses for cavalry and artillery, $1,500,000.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to strike out that paragraph. According to the statement just made by the gentleman having charge of this bill it is for horses for cavalry and artillery against the Indians. When Braddock attempted to cross the ford with all his artillery and horses there was a young officer of the American militia who informed him that that sort of Indian warfare would not do, but the bold, blundering Briton went on, and that was the last of him.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman the name of that American soldier.

Mr. CHANLER. His name was George Washington.

Mr. SPALDING. I would inform the gentleman that he was a lieutenant.

Mr. CHANLER. I said he was an officer. As the gentleman from Ohio has corrected me, I hope he will aid me in correcting the abuses of this committee, of which I believe he is a member.

It is exactly in that way that this Committee on Appropriations are blundering through with this bill. Now, here is a question in regard to sending the American Army right into the Indian country with artillery and horses to be shot and destroyed. No other ground for the huge appropriations in this bill has been advanced but that they are to carry on this extravagant Indian war. Does the gentleman mean to tell us that this Indian war has been conducted with artillery and horses, and that that is a ground for this immense deficiency in the quartermaster's department? Sir, if the statement of the gentleman having charge of this bill is true there were more mules than horses in that department. If that was the basis of carrying on the war in the Indian country the mules were ahead. I do not believe that that position can be taken with any credit before the people of this country or that the reputation of the Army of the United States is safe in the hands of this Committee on Appropriations. Either great stupidity or great dishonesty is at the base of this whole matter. Either the Committee on Appropriations are determined to draw from the Treasury of the United States a certain net sum for expenses that cannot be justified before the country or they do not know the facts of the case. Either they are acting in complicity or in ignorance, and it is not satisfactory to this side of the House, however unanimous they may be upon the other side with regard to such extravagance of public expenditure, it is not enough to assert upon this floor that the Indian war is to cause all of this extravagance. Upward of nineteen million dollars have been spent in carrying on a border warfare which in the time of Daniel Boone was committed to the people on the frontier with much more success and with greater economy. From the coast of the Atlantic to the base of the Rocky mountains the American people have carried on their own war against the Indian tribes with magnificent success with no thanks to the Committee on Appropriations; and I ask from the party in power that they stop ruining the people under the pretext of being led by their officers to battle when the men who steal the money are here in this Capitol, and women with them, organized in a state of demoralization unequalled in the history of this or any other country. Sir, this is a time to stop. This Government is rotting at the base. And when you have just elected a great soldier for your Chief Magistrate to bring in this plundering scheme to cover up your past discrepancies and perhaps political crimes is a futile effort in the face of the criticism which should be directed against you by the press and people of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to debate this question only for the purpose of replying to the remarks made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] I of course have nothing to do with the Committee on Appropriations more than any other member of this House. But I cannot sit here in my seat and hear members who stand unimpeached by anybody or any character of a man calling himself a man accused of being in complicity, either in ignorance or in crime, with the Army that is fighting the battle of freedom and of civilization. The gentleman from New York seems to intimate that the Army is in complicity with one of the committees of this House, the Committee on Appropriations; and he says that not only is the Committee on Appropriations either ignorant or in complicity with the Army, but the Government is rotten to the very heart. God knows if the Government is rotten to the heart that gentleman must be the core. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER, (amid cries of "Order!" and laughter.) I did not say the heart of the Republican party, because that party has no heart.

Mr. MULLINS. Why on earth all this tirade?

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, [cries of "Order!"] I wish to correct my allusion to mules; I did not mean any Tennessee mule.

Mr. MULLINS. I cannot stop to be annoyed and nibbled at by rats—not now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. The public interest. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. MULLINS. The Committee on Appropriations are unimpeachable in their attitude before the country; and yet their character as a class and a committee is dragged in here and assailed until, if the statements made are taken as matters of fact, they should be expelled from this House.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CHANLER. My point of order is that the question before the House is not the frauds on the Tennessee school fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] will proceed.

Mr. MULLINS. I am trying to clear the brush out of the way that has been thrown in the way, without any cause and without any sense, as I suppose, or any intentional meaning to be applied as an argument to the question under discussion. As to the meaning of the complaint that the gentleman makes in regard to the Army having employed mules instead of horses, I can see but little reason or sense in the argument that he makes upon it. I think an Indian is as nigh a mule as the other gentleman is to a horse. [Laughter.] And we should fight them with anything we can get hold of if it becomes necessary. We should not only fight them with mules, but with the long-eared stock. And I know where you can go and get hundreds of them at a very low price. [Laughter.] I trust the committee will be sustained in their position.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. CHANLER; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of officers' baggage, $100,000.
For transportation of the Army and its supplies, $7,000,000.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to amend the last clause read by reducing the amount from $7,000,000 to $6,000,000. I do this for the purpose of calling attention to some remarks that I made at the last session of Congress upon this subject of Army appropriation. I am not satisfied with this item; it is too large an item for a deficiency bill. Therefore, I want information in regard to it, if the Committee on Appropriations are disposed to give that information to the House. I said last summer, when the Army appropriation bill was under consideration, that if the Committee on Appropriations reduced the estimates as they proposed we would be met with a heavy deficiency bill this winter. I charged then, and I believe I was right, that the Committee on Appropriations was shrinking from their plain duty in failing to appropriate the amount necessary to carry the Army through the current year. And I also charged that that failure was in view of the then pending elections. In reply to that I was met by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who had charge of the bill at that time, by the statement that I merely desired to be considered a prophet, and to be able to say this winter, whatever the deficiency that might be brought in, "I told you so." I now respond by saying that I did tell the country so, and I wish to remind them now of the fact; my statements then have been verified by subsequent facts. I charged then, and I repeat the charge now, that the appropriations were unduly cut down in view of the approaching elections, and the effect desired to be produced upon the people; and I have been supported in that view by remarks made the other day by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who informed the House that the proposition to tax the interest of the bonds of the United States was adopted by this House in view of the elections last fall. A speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was circulated throughout the country last fall as a campaign document on the Republican side, claiming that for the current year great reductions in the expenditures had been made, and among other things that extraordinary reductions had been made in the cost of the Army. In reply to this speech I charged that his figures were deceptive and unreliable, and greatly understated our actual expenses. Now, when the test of time is applied to these mutual estimates and predictions we are met with a demand for nearly twenty million dollars to meet deficiencies in the appropriations of last session, more than two thirds of which is for the Army alone.

Now, sir, I desire that members of this House and the people of the country shall be reminded of the fact that in the appeals made to the people last fall by the representatives of the party now in power in Congress and about to assume the power of the entire administration, in the professions of retrenchment and reform then made by that party, they did not disclose to the country the true amount of the expenses they were incurring, and particularly the sum they were annually expending for carrying on the Army. This, I submit, is not the true way of legislating in a country like ours where the power comes from the people, and where the people are entitled to full information upon all questions affecting their interests. Whatever the amount of money required, we should inform the people in advance and meet our responsibilities like men. We should appropriate the amount really required, whether there be an election pending or not. We should not, because an election is pending, appropriate a smaller amount than that we know to be necessary for the public service and afterward propose to appropriate as a deficiency half as much again. Why, sir, the amount we are now called upon to appropriate as a deficiency for the Army is nearly fourteen million dollars, almost half as much as was appropriated last summer to carry on the Army for the current year, thus exhibiting a deficiency of almost fifty per cent., which, so far as my knowledge extends, is unprecedented.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he believes it to be possible to estimate with perfect accuracy the expenses of such an Army as ours.

Mr. NIBLACK. Why, Mr. Chairman, the most inexperienced member of this House, in view of the well-understood facts, must have known and doubtless did know last summer that the amount then appropriated was too small to support the number of men in our Army. We had only to recur to the history of the expenses of the Army to satisfy ourselves of that proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling to take up the very valuable time of the House by political discussion upon so important a bill as this. I am sorry to hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] confess that at the last session he and his friends, for political purposes, for the purpose of charging extravagance upon the Republican party, voted for the largest appropriations. I am sorry, too, that the gentleman charges that we on this side of the House, in our efforts to restrain the Departments—Departments in sympathy with the gentleman politically—and to make as small appropriations as possible in hope of inducing economy, had no other purpose than a political one. If the gentleman means to say that our purpose was to satisfy the people that we were endeavoring to be as economical as possible, and making smaller appropriations than his prodigal Administration recommended, he is undoubtedly correct. We not only wanted to satisfy the people that we were struggling for that purpose, but we have endeavored to accomplish that purpose. We not only sought to put on an appearance of economy, but we have shown, as we think, that we actually were anxious to secure an economical administration. And now the gentleman says that after the election is over we come in with a deficiency bill. Why, sir, if we had not made our appropriations so small at that time we should have had almost as large a deficiency bill now. The very fact that we made the appropriation small and notified the President and his prodigal officers that they must get along with that sum has resulted in a less expenditure. As I stated before, the continuance of the Indian war has made it necessary to appropriate now a larger sum than we had hoped would be necessary.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to amend the amendment so as to increase the amount of the appropriation $500,000.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I ever heard it charged that the War Department during the last four years has been in sym-thy with the party to which I belong. On the contrary, I think the evidence is overwhelming that the sympathies of the War Department, so far as it has had any political sympathies, have been against that party. The estimates for the Army last year, to which the gentleman has referred, were, if I remember correctly, made by General Grant, then acting Secretary of War, and not by any one in sympathy with the party to which I belong. When the gentleman says I have admitted that we for political purposes voted for large appropriations he has either misunderstood what I have said or he desires to place me in a false position. I made no such admission. I seldom vote to increase appropriations recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means for any purpose. But what I charged then, and what I repeat in substance now, is that the Committee of Ways and Means then failed to recommend to the House an appropriation sufficient to carry on the War Department for the current year. I did so charge then, and I repeat the charge now. They did not so recommend to the House then, and the House did not vote enough to carry on the Department for this year. This is verified by the deficiency which we are now called upon to vote. I do not want large appropriations, and I trust the party I cooperate with do not want large appropriations; and we have the right to insist that this House shall take the responsibility of voting the requisite amount to carry on the War Department to pay the officers and soldiers and everybody in the employment of the Government their salaries and wages, and that they shall not evade this responsibility by voting partial amounts at one time and then coming in at the following session and ask us to pass a deficiency bill. The tendency if not the purpose of such legislation is to impose upon the people of the country and induce them to believe the Government is being carried on for a less amount than it really is.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move that the committee rise in order that we may close debate.

Mr. CHANLER. We want an answer to our pertinent questions, and not to have the camp-followers on the other side turned upon us. We want plain answers, and not tomfoolery.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 41.

Mr. CHANLER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. CHANLER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. POMEROY, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. PRICE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1812, to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors and assessors.

It further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1367) for the relief of George Kaiser;

An act (H. R. No. 234) for the relief of N. A. Shuttleworth, of Harrison county, West Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 1128) for the relief of Isaac Watts; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine.

It further announced that the Senate had passed House bill No. 425, for the relief of Mary A. Fillen, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It announced, in conclusion, that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 972) for the benefit of Stuart Barnes;

A bill (S. No. 924) for the relief of Ellen Simms;

A bill (S. No. 591) for the relief of O. N. Cutler;

A bill (S. No. 923) for the relief of Captain James Kelly;

A bill (S. No. 957) for the relief of S. & H. Sayles;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 163) for the relief of Benjamin Corley and James W. Boswell; and

A bill (H. R. No. 257) to refer the claim of O. P. Cobb and others to the Court of Claims.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the deficiency appropriation bill; but as preliminary to that motion I move that when the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon that bill all general debate shall terminate on the bill down to line one hundred and seventy-two, and that on that part of the bill from line one hundred and seventy-two to line one hundred and seventy-eight it be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that debate can only be closed on the pending paragraph, not on the entire bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The question being put, there were—ayes 86, noes 84.

Mr. BURR and Mr. CHANLER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 129, nays 33, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Hopkins, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Plants, Poland, Pomerooy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taft, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—129.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Beck, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Robinson, Ross, Stone, Taber, Tift, Van Auker, Van Trump, Wood, Woodward, and Young—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Baldwin, Barnum, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Benjamin F. Butler, Calk, Clift, Dewees, Donnelly, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Goss, Haight, Halsey, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jenckes, Kellogg, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Morrill, Morrissey, Nicholson, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Polesley, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Sypher, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—60.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and debate was ordered to be closed, as indicated by the motion.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. PRICE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. NIBLACK, to strike out "$7,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,500,000," so that the paragraph will read:

For transportation of the Army and its supplies, $5,500,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingencies of the Army, $475,000.

Mr. STOVER. I raise a point of order that this is a deficiency bill, and as a deficiency is something wanting or lacking there can be no contingency in such a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that this is a bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies "and for other purposes." It is not only a bill to cover deficiencies in appropriations but a bill "for other purposes."

Mr. STOVER. Then I move to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For secret service fund, $100,000:

Provided, That the three last-named sums are appropriated for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to settle accounts of disbursing officers for expenditures already made, and shall not make any actual disbursement, but merely a transfer on the books of the Treasury.

Mr. BURR. I move to strike out that clause; and I remarked, in support of that motion, that the total amount appropriated by this bill, as stated in the report, is fourteen or fifteen million dollars. The exact amount I find by further inspection to be $19,883,092, or in round numbers $20,000,000. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] who has charge of this bill, stated that the reason why small amounts comparatively were appropriated by the legislative action of one year ago was in order to admonish the President of the United States and the officers subordinate to him that they must study economy and not transgress beyond a certain line of expenditures in administering the affairs of the Government, and he has said that had larger amounts been appropriated last year those several sums would all have been expended and the same deficiency bill would have been to-day pending for action. Now, that might be a good argument under a given condition of facts which, however, do not to-day exist. This part of the bill appropriating over nineteen millions is for deficiencies exclusively in the War Department, a Department where the President of the United States has no more power to expend money or carry into operation his peculiar views than have I or any other private citizen of the United States.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BURR. Does the gentleman wish to shield himself behind a technical point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I do not think a very sensible man would ask such a question as that. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing his amendment, because the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] told me that he wanted to discuss this clause, and I therefore reserved ten minutes for its discussion. I make the point of order so that the ten minutes shall not be consumed in discussing something else, and give no opportunity to gentlemen who wish to discuss this clause; otherwise I would allow the gentleman to discuss anything he wanted.

Mr. BURR. We have noticed that there is not much disposition to discuss this point. I await the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman will see that there are only ten minutes for discussion on this clause.

Mr. BURR. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] intimates to me that he does not wish to discuss this clause.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURR. By the permission of the Chair and of the committee I will now proceed. I was stating that the President of the United States could not expend one cent of the people's money in this Department, and could not under the legislation of this House, sanctioned by the Senate, even pass an order to a subordinate officer without transmitting that order through the General-in-Chief of the Army, who is now President-elect of the United States. Was it to trammel and control the President-elect that these deficient appropriations were made one year ago? Further, sir, the control of the Administration, so far as the War Department has been concerned, during the past year has been all the time under the charge of a Secretary of War who has been, in the judgment of our friends on the other side of the House, in opposition to the Democratic party; and no expenditure could be made, no theory advocated, no measures carried out in that Department without the sanction of the Secretary of War. Was it to curb Edwin M. Stanton? Was it to control General Grant while he was Secretary of War ad interim? Or was it to limit the action of General Schofield, since Secretary of War by appointment and confirmation? Was it to limit either of those officers in their action that those deficient appropriations were made? No, sir; that subterfuge will not do. The entire, exclusive control of the War Department in all its various bureaus and branches has been during the whole of the past year in the hands of the leaders and controllers of the Radical party. And when an attempt was made by the President of the United States to assume some constitutional control of that Department of the Government by appointing a Secretary of War to succeed Edwin M. Stanton it was telegraphed from one end of Pennsylvania avenue to the other, to Edwin M. Stanton, then acting as Secretary of War, "stick;" and the whole Radical party, echoing that word "stick," has all the time controlled that Department. And in order, as I here allege, to blind the people and to deceive the voters of the United States by their action a year ago they reduced the appropriations so as to make the people believe that there would be a proportionate reduction of taxation; and to-day they acknowledge on the record that their pretense of twelve months ago was a deception and a fraud.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] has yielded the time I agreed to give him to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Burr] to make his stump speech. I raised the point of order I did during the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois in order to prevent his using up the time intended for the gentleman from New York, who said that he did not want it.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Burr] obtained the floor in his own right, by being recognized by the Chair, and proceeded with his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD. I move to amend the proviso by inserting after the words "expenditures already made" the words "if made in pursuance of law;" so that portion of the bill will read as follows:

For contingencies of the Army, $475,000.
For medical and hospital department, $750,000.
For secret service fund, $100,000: Provided, That the three last-named sums are appropriated for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to settle accounts of disbursing officers for expenditures already made, if made in pursuance of law, and shall not make any actual disbursement, but merely a transfer on the books of the Treasury.

I do not make this amendment for the purpose of discussing any political or general subject, but to make some practical suggestions in reference to the proviso. The old members of this House, I am sure, can look back to a period, not very remote, when such a thing as a deficiency bill was not known at all. The introduction of this principle in our legislation is something entirely new and modern. When first introduced deficiency bills were intended to make up deficiencies of a few hundred thousand dollars at the utmost in cases where it was impossible to meet every possible expenditure at the time the original appropriations were made. This thing has grown up until our deficiency bills absolutely amount in the aggregate to more than the whole expenditures of the Government were fifteen years ago.

But I have not risen for the purpose of saying that this deficiency bill may not be right. So far as it is really a deficiency bill it may be proper; but when it is proposed, as it is by this proviso, to go further and legalize expenditures made in contravention of law, and to permit the accounts of disbursing officers to be audited and allowed and paid in cases where expenditures have been made not in pursuance of any law whatever, I say that this is getting to be a monstrous abuse, and it is time that Congress should pause before it takes this action. If gentlemen will look at this proviso they will see that it proposes to audit and allow $1,250,000 that have been expended without any authority of law whatever. It is not for a deficiency of appropriation, but for an excess of expenditure not warranted by any law.

The object of my amendment is to provide that in the transfer of appropriations from one branch of the service to another, no account shall be allowed to any disbursing officer unless the expenditure has been made in pursuance of some existing law. I do not know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has directed his attention particularly to this point, but I hope he will consent that my amendment may be adopted. I have offered it in good faith, and not for any improper or partisan purpose.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman is quite right in saying that the money has been expended, but he is wrong in supposing that it has been expended in violation of law. The Committee on Appropriations have on several different occasions endeavored to get a clause in an appropriation bill providing that no money appropriated for one branch of the service shall be expended on another branch of the service, in order to cut off this practice that has grown up of transferring the fund appropriated for one department to another department for some other purpose. We have succeeded in getting such a clause inserted in a bill still pending and not passed that will cut that practice up by the roots. We have attempted it before, but have always failed. Now, the money appropriated in these three items is for expenditures made, for which vouchers were returned, and which were sanctioned by the accounting officers. But when the books come to be settled it is ascertained that there is needed an appropriation specially for that purpose, although a general appropriation of the money has already been made. The expenditure of the money has extended over several years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman will accept my amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I see no objection to it.

The amendment of Mr. Wood was agreed to. The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BURR, to strike out the paragraph as amended; and being taken, it was not agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to which I think the Committee on Appropriations will have no objection; and I would like to have a moment to explain it.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been terminated by order of the House; and the committee cannot extend it. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of a portrait of the late President, Abraham Lincoln, to be placed in the Executive Mansion, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That said portrait shall be selected by the incoming President of the United States.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I raise a point of order that this amendment is not in order on this bill. The proper place for it is in the miscellaneous appropriation bill which was reported this morning.

Mr. LOGAN. That may be; but I did not suppose anybody would object to inserting the provision in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To carry out the provisions of section fourteen of an act relating to pensions, approved July 27, 1868, $15,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. By the instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For collecting and preparing the proceedings at the decoration of the soldiers' graves, under resolution of June 22, 1868, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to amend by inserting the following:

To supply deficiency in the amount required for the survey of a line dividing the Creek country under third and fifth articles of treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, concluded June 14, 1866, and for surveying exterior boundary of a grant of land to the Seminole nation of Indians under the third article of the treaty with that nation, concluded March 21, 1866, $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, the appropriation embraced in this amendment was estimated for by the Department at the last session of Congress, but the estimate was not acted on by the Committee on Appropriations. At this session I appeared before that committee for the purpose of advocating the insertion of the appropriation in this bill, but I found that the bill had the day before been reported to the House. I explained the amendment to the committee, stating that the work had already been performed by a citizen of Kansas, a resident of my own district, to the satisfaction of the Department, and that the appropriation ought to be made. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who is not now in his seat, requested that under the circumstances the amendment should be offered in the House. All I have to say is that this work has been performed under a contract with the Indian department; that no complaint is made in reference to the manner in which the work has been done, and it ought to be paid for. I believe that this bill is the proper one in which to insert the amendment, which I hope will meet with no objection.

I have here a long letter from the Department explaining the propriety of making this appropriation; but I will not occupy time by having the letter read, unless there is serious objection to my proposition. If the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does not concur in the propriety of this amendment, I shall ask that the letter be read for the information of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, there is another appropriation bill still pending—the miscellaneous appropriation bill reported this morning—to which the Committee on Appropriations can offer such amendments as they may deem proper. The gentleman ought to take this amendment before the Committee on Appropriations for their examination; and if the committee should become satisfied that the provision ought to be adopted they can move it as an amendment to the miscellaneous appropriation bill, generally called the "omnibus bill." Having given the matter no examination I cannot, for one, consent that the amendment shall be adopted in this bill. It may be right; it may be all wrong. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it, and bring it before the Committee on Appropriations. If he insists on pressing it here I hope it will be voted down.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For printing and binding three thousand copies of the laws of the Territory of Utah, as estimated by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,006 12.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the Department has sent us no estimate for this as a deficiency. I make the same remark about this that I did about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas. If it has merit the gentleman can go before the Committee on Appropriations, have a hearing, and let it be offered as an amendment to the miscellaneous appropriation bill. An amendment of this kind should not be sprung upon us in Committee of the Whole when it has received no examination by a committee and when we cannot know whether it is right or wrong.

The amendment of Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, was rejected.

Mr. JUDD. I move to insert the following:

For continuing the work on the marine hospital at Chicago, $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the estimate of the Department for continuing this work is $50,000. I have made the appropriation in my amendment one half of that because the Committee on Appropriations told me that had been their rule in reference to other appropriations. This work is in progress, and unless this appropriation is made it will stand still and deteriorate, as a matter of course.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This is one of those appropriations which the committee have been adopting this morning and adopted last night. The gentleman says that the estimate of the Department is $50,000, and he asks for $25,000. I suppose it has as much merit as the others. I am opposed to them all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STOVER. I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 6.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. STOVER. Then I offer the following amendment here:

For supplying deficiency in the compensation of the register and receiver in the land office at Boise City, Idaho Territory, for office rent and purchase of furniture, $6,324.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee of the Whole with any lengthy discussion; and I will, therefore, content myself with saying that this is a small estimate, and the appropriation is actually necessary. The question has been before the Committee on the Public Lands and has met with their hearty approbation. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Commissioner of Public Lands.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 26, 1869.

SIR: The want of means for surveys in this Territory has made the field for settlement and entry comparatively small, and thus the officers have not been enabled to realize the amount it was anticipated they would receive.

The expenses of the offices have been reported to us as being quite heavy, and if any relief can be afforded them by congressional legislation I would recommend such action.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JOS. S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. E. D. HOLBROOK.

Mr. STOVER. These officers are receiving but small salaries. They cannot get one room in Boise City, I understand, for less than $250 a month in gold, and that without furniture.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to make the same remark about this that I did in reference to the amendments of the gentleman from Utah and the gentleman from Kansas, and that is these matters ought to be taken before the Committee on Appropriations. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I wish to say that so far as the amendment I offered, in the first place, is concerned it was taken before the Committee on Appropriations. I was told that the deficiency bill had been reported and was then in the Committee of the Whole. I was told by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that if I would hand the amendment to him in the House he would offer it. He evidently assented to it. He is absent now on account of illness, and I am told by the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I must go back to that committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Allow me to finish my remarks.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to irrelevant discussion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations will hear all these applications, and when they are satisfied they are right they will come here and move them as amendments in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLBROOK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STOVER, and Mr. WASHBURN of Wisconsin were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move the following amendment:

For amount required to pay James S. Emery and Thomas P. Fenlon for legal services rendered by them in 1865-66 in defending suits instituted against the United States in the State of Kansas respecting the rights and property of Indians, $2,800: Provided, That the said amount shall be found to be justly due after examination by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I make the point of order that is not in accordance with any law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a sufficient amount to pay the regular salary of the present minister resident at Portugal, and the exchange thereon, from the 1st day of July, 1866, so long as he shall hold his said office.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by striking out the words "he shall hold his said office" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the same was withheld from him."

I believe I am the only living member of the Committee on Appropriations that some three or four years ago were instrumental in stopping the salary of the minister at Portugal. Very many members on this floor will recollect the circumstances. We then differed with the Senate, and I was one of a committee of conference that insisted upon withholding the salary of the then and now minister at Portugal on account of what we conceived to be an act of injustice done by him to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. This is not germane.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I am appealing to the justice of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I simply do not wish to lose the question of order that I have made. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman's speech.

Mr. SPALDING. Do it when I get through. I persisted, together with the late lamented chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Stevens, and one or two others, in withholding this salary, and it was withheld for about two years. It was then restored, and the two last annual appropriation bills have contained appropriations for the salary of this minister, but he has never received pay for the two years during which his pay was suspended. Now, before I leave Congress I wish to acknowledge that I erred as a statesman in doing this. I wish now to do a simple act of justice to a fellow-citizen, and I hope this House will concur with the Committee on Appropriations in repairing, even at this late hour, the injury to this man. I think we ought not to have done it, and I hope now that we will restore the lapsed salary in this deficiency bill. I hope no gentleman will object.

Mr. MAYNARD. I made the question of order as to whether this proposition is germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to make that point.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly that is the point I made, and I rose while the gentleman was speaking in order that I might not lose the benefit of it by apparently submitting to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that this is a deficiency due, if at all, under a law in operation at the time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will now say a word in opposition to the amendment. As I understand the facts in the case this is the same officer whose payment we have repeatedly denied, and by every expression of the legislative will have declared that we did not wish and could not have him to represent us at that Government. Yet in utter disregard, not to say defiance, of the repeatedly expressed will of Congress this officer has been kept at his post by the executive department and has consented to remain there. He is still there, and we are asked now, in the closing acts of this Congress, to recant, to retract our former action, to write ourselves down before the country and posterity as culpable, as having been engaged in a petty, little, unworthy squabble. For one I am unwilling to do it. I am unwilling to place myself and the body to which I belong in any such attitude upon the records before the country. Wait till this gentleman's connection with this mission shall be formally closed, and then let the matter come up as a claim to be examined upon the principle ex equo et bono, upon the principle of the intrinsic justice of the case, to be paid just as much and no more than the claimant is found entitled to receive. But for us at this time to enter a cognovit, a confession of judgment before the country, for one am not willing to do it, and I trust the House will not do it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

It will be recollected by the members of the House that this is the same case which has appeared for the last three years. It is the case of the minister to Portugal who wrote an insulting letter to the Secretary of State in reference to Congress. Congress, I think some three years ago, refused to appropriate the money to pay his salary any longer. They paid him his salary for the current year, but refused to make an appropriation to pay him for the next year, and subsequently refused again when the Committee on Appropriations reported an appropriation to pay him.

Mr. SPALDING. Last year we paid the salary.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that after Congress has expressed its determination not to pay the minister, thus expressing its disapprobation of his course as our representative abroad, he at least ought to have the decency to resign and come home, and not remain there from year to year and afterward come in here and ask us to make up his back salary. For one, after voting as I have voted heretofore not to pay this salary, I am not disposed to take back that vote and now vote to pay him; and I hope the committee will not do it.

Mr. PAINE. After having voted as I have twice in this House to discontinue this mission, so far as I was able to express myself in favor of it by a vote on an appropriation bill, I am not willing to stultify myself by voting for this appropriation to-day, even though my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] of the Committee on Appropriations may have come to the conclusion to recant what he has said and change his position. Now, when we refused in two successive appropriation bills to pay the salary of this minister to Portugal we notified him, as well as the Secretary of State and the President of the United States, that that mission must be discontinued. We did not merely notify the President and Secretary, but we notified him. It will not do to tell me that he was retained there by Mr. Seward or by Mr. Johnson, because he was kept in full knowledge of the action of this House, and he remained there at his own peril. When I voted to withhold the appropriation for the payment of his salary I did not intend so soon as this to eat my words. I based my action upon grounds which I well understood, and which most of the members here present to-day will remember, and which I will not repeat; and I say that there is to-day an additional reason for withholding this appropriation, because he has deliberately defied us. He has said to us, speaking through the mouth of the Secretary of State, "You may withhold the appropriation this year, you may withhold it next year, but sooner or later I will find some appropriation committee that will recommend it; sooner or later I will find a House that will pay it." Sir, I will vote against this appropriation now. I will vote against it now all the more readily because he has so defiantly thrust this in our faces. While we told him that he could not remain there he has remained. He has defied our votes and we are called upon to-day to go back upon our own record and admit to the country and admit to him that we have been culpable and have done him wrong. Sir, I will make no such admission. We have done no wrong. We did right at first and he did wrong, and every year that the Secretary of State and the President have retained him there in defiance of our votes they have done what was wrong, and he himself in remaining there has done what was wrong.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Allow me to say that those who are opposed to the original paragraph may safely vote for this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and then vote to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SPALDING's amendment was agreed to—aye seventy-one, noes not counted.

Mr. UPSON. I move to strike out the word "for" at the commencement of the paragraph. I suppose it is the intention of the committee to appropriate a sufficient amount for this purpose, but I cannot see any sense in the use of the word "for" there. The first clause of the bill appropriates money to pay all these items, and it seems to me that the word "for" has no meaning here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have no character for consistency to maintain in regard to this matter, for I was not a member of the Congress that refused to appropriate the money to pay Mr. Harvey. But I understand the facts to be simply these: Mr. Harvey was appointed our minister to Portugal. No man pretends that he has not discharged his duties there faithfully so far as our Government and the Government of Portugal are concerned. And I will say here that if gentlemen will examine the diplomatic correspondence they will find there what reflects great credit upon Mr. Harvey. They will find, too, that the kingdom of Portugal was about the only kingdom in Europe that refused belligerent rights to the rebels. There is nothing that can be alleged against Mr. Harvey so far as the discharge of his duties as minister to Portugal is concerned.

What is the complaint, then? It is that he wrote a private letter to the Secretary of State, which the Secretary was so imprudent as to make public, in which letter Mr. Harvey spoke of Congress in terms not as complimentary as gentlemen would like. Now, if you could examine all the private letters that may have been written by Government officials you might perhaps find that there are other people who have at times felt themselves at liberty to express sentiments concerning Congress that do not accord entirely with the estimate we place upon ourselves. The amount asked to be appropriated here is for a debt justly due. You have no right to refuse to pay Mr. Harvey his salary any more than you have the right to refuse to vote the salary of the President of the United States because he has spoken in terms of disrespect of Congress. There was one way by which you could have stopped his pay, and that way was to abolish the mission. But you did not do that, and he has continued to discharge his duties there. Now, it seems to me that it is rather a small business to undertake to stop this man's pay simply because of a slight imprudence of which he was guilty, and which I understand he has explained away to the satisfaction of most of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MYERS. I would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] whether it does not also appear by documentary evidence that the friendly action of Portugal toward this Government during the rebellion, and the friendly feelings it frequently expressed were largely due to the efforts of Mr. Harvey?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. There is no question of that fact, for it appears in the correspondence which took place. I am sorry to differ with my colleague [Mr. PAINE] on this question, but I am compelled to do so, and I trust that the House will no longer adhere to a position assumed in a moment of passion and wounded pride, but imitate the manly conduct of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] and as far as it may, make the amende honorable.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 1966) for the relief of Foster & Tower.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 467) to confirm an entry of land by Moses F. Shinn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PIERCE asked and obtained leave of absence from the session to-night on account of sickness.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The pending amendment was in relation to the mission to Portugal.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. COVODE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I make that motion because I wish to state some few things that I am satisfied many of my friends are not familiar with. The committee will recollect that prejudice was first excited against Mr. Harvey at the beginning of the war because of some correspondence carried on between him and Judge McGrath, of South Carolina; and the House called upon President Lincoln to communicate that correspondence to Congress. I was advised by Mr. Harvey, in a communication from Lisbon, Portugal, that there were some letters not communicated that would be of interest to the House and to the country. I was directed to call upon Mr. Lincoln to ascertain whether the statements of Mr. Harvey were correct or not. Mr. Harvey in that communication said that he carried on that correspondence for the Government of the United States with the view of averting, if possible, the shedding of blood; and he said that Mr. Lincoln had in his possession certain important dispatches which would explain the real nature of the transaction. I went to Mr. Lincoln and asked him whether that was true, he not having answered the inquiry of the House with reference to that correspondence. Mr. Lincoln said that he had a recollection of the matter. He took down the "Sumter papers," as they were called; and the very first paper, the one on top of the pile, was the important dispatch to which Mr. Harvey had particularly referred in his letter from Lisbon, and which shows that Mr. Harvey carried on that correspondence for Mr. Seward, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. Lincoln; and Mr. Lincoln had the correspondence in his possession at the very time the telegraphic dispatches throughout the country were seized, and that for the purpose of destroying Mr. Harvey.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does not all that appear on the records of this House?

Mr. COVODE. No, sir; it does not. Now, sir, Mr. Harvey, while at Lisbon during the war, was successful in preventing trouble between Portugal and this country, and from that time to this he has discharged his duties faithfully. He has furnished to the Secretary of State a vast amount of information showing the stupendous naval frauds perpetrated there. He has sent to me a copy of that correspondence, asking me to bring it to the attention of Congress. While he is thus serving the country abroad his family is suffering here in Washington. Now, does any one suppose that Mr. Harvey is going to be kept out of his pay for all time? He needs this money now. He is poor. He has served the country faithfully. He made a mistake in writing a letter; but that mistake was made when there were hundreds of men in this country belonging to the Republican party, among them members of this House and of the Senate, who were disposed to agree with the policy of Mr. Johnson. I hope that Mr. Harvey will be allowed the pay which he has earned.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I desired to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] before he took his seat, up to what time Mr. Harvey has been paid?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. It strikes me that gentlemen have not been discussing the question before the committee. I regard this as a question between Congress on the one side and Mr. Seward, representing the Administration, on the other. Congress, for reasons which seemed to it good decided that so far as appropriations for that purpose were necessary they would not keep up a representation at the court of Portugal. They decided thus again and again. The Administration, acting through Mr. Seward, offensively, insolently, defiantly, resolved that they would keep a representative there.

Under the Constitution the President, having the power to appoint ambassadors and other diplomatic representatives, could make this appointment; but the appointment having been made he and the incumbent whom he kept in office under such circumstances were fully apprised of the fact that the law-making power and the money-appropriating power had decided, for reasons which it considered sufficient, not to keep up that representation, so far at least as pay for it was concerned. We are now called upon to go back upon all this. Why? Because it is said here is a debt due to Mr. Harvey. It is no debt. This service was performed with a full knowledge upon his part that no pay was to be given. We are called upon to make this payment because, as it is claimed, Mr. Harvey has served the country well. That does not properly enter into the question. We are called upon to go back and consider the question whether Congress ought to have acted as it did upon the facts before it at that time. Sir, I was satisfied then and I am satisfied now that Congress did right. But that is not the question. The question is whether when the law-making and the money-appropriating power has decided for two successive years not to pay for the services of a minister at Lisbon, it shall be held incumbent upon us now to bow our knees and "with bated breath and whispering humbleness" admit to Mr. Seward and to the Administration that they were right and we were wrong; and therefore we will not only forgive that for which they deserve punishment, but will sanction it by backing out of the position which we have heretofore deliberately taken.

Mr. HARVEY is but a small portion, it seems to me, in the issue now made up. Discuss this matter as you will, turn it as you may, the question is simply this, shall the Congress of the United States be called upon at a subsequent date to pay as a debt due from the Government for services, which services have been rendered; not with the sanction but against the notice of Congress and upon information that it did not intend to pay for them, because of some sympathy to be got up or some question raised as to whether Mr. Harvey was or was not rightly treated originally? This is the issue, I think, we have before us; and on that issue, whatever other gentlemen may do, I shall resort to the only means to rebuke Mr. Seward's insolence and defiance of the law-making power by telling him that we shall not pay his man no matter what his services have been.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COVODE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I renew it; and I wish to say to my colleague and to the gentleman from Wisconsin, however much I admire their pluck, that we all have occasionally to take the back track. None of us are so proud as never to confess that we are wrong. I think I have as much of that in my composition as either of the learned gentlemen who addressed the committee. I have already stated that I was a principal actor in this—shall I say tragic or comic scene? We have done wrong; and the Committee on Appropriations for the last two years have put in the appropriation bill an appropriation to pay his salary. It is all wrong to say that Congress had the right to remove him. Congress never had the power to remove him. The Executive never suspended him. We only suspended his pay. We have since then made regular appropriation for his pay.

Mr. SCHENCK. I admit that the power is in the President to appoint diplomatic agents, but I also hold that the power is in Congress to say whether they shall or shall not be paid. Congress has not suspended him, but it has suspended his pay.

Mr. SPALDING. It was undertaken on the part of Congress to withdraw him, but he was not withdrawn. He has stayed there, and for the past two years Congress has concluded to go on and pay him. In the last two appropriation bills he has had his salary allowed him. He has had his salary for the last year; he has it for this fiscal year, and the bill has passed both Houses making provision for it for the next year. The Committee on Appropriations stood eight to one on this question. The chairman of the committee has since been taken sick. If he were here he would say to this Committee of the Whole, in much better language than I can use, that it is an act of justice to pay these two years' salary which we have withheld from Mr. Harvey. The committee agree to this, and hence it is in the deficiency bill; and I hope that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress will not continue to perpetrate what I regard as a fundamental error in our statesmanship.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not wish to mingle in this debate on the merits of this claim. I suppose the Committee on Appropriations understand this matter, and I presume that gentlemen have their minds made up. But I wish to say that for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to arraign Mr. Seward—for a member of the Republican party to arraign him—is base ingratitude. Why, sir, Mr. Seward was the Prospero of this fiction of a political organization. He it was who created your Caliban, brought your Ariel into being; and sent your Puck around the world. He is your master. You would not be here to-day if his mind had not found for you a dogma in the enunciation of the "irrepressible conflict." But for him the mock militiamen who arrayed themselves in tinsel and remained here in this House drawing pay as generals while your battles were being fought would never have had an existence. This old organizer of your party left you because you proved degenerate even from the fiction that he created for you. The "irrepressible conflict" was a thing which you had not the capacity to carry on with success. The master mind that created you left you, and you are wrangling over the remnant of your power, and all that is left for you is to make this deficiency bill the stalking horse for the wrangling in your own organization. You have impeached the man that you elected as Vice President because he was too brave and too honest for you to meet face to face; and his Cabinet, which could not give you all you would plunder, must be disgraced by every obloquy you can put upon them here and elsewhere.

Now, sir, I do not wish that this question should be mixed up. I think it is a fair and proper subject of debate as introduced by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is a fair question what constitutes the Republican party to-day? Who is its head? Who leads you? What is your object and destiny? Have you no greater object than to sting one another to death like a snarl of snakes? [Laughter.] Cannot you find some nobler work than to strike down a man who, in a distant port, while your brigadiers were here in this House drawing pay and wearing the uniform and your soldiers were fighting your battles in the field, was protecting you abroad and giving you honor before one of the established Governments of Europe? Cannot you find a nobler vocation than that?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew it. I desire to say one word upon this matter not personal at all to Mr. Harvey, the minister to Portugal. I propose to vote against the appropriation on this ground: the Congress of the United States have said to the President of the United States that in their judgment this gentleman was not a proper representative of the United States to a foreign court. Whether that was right or wrong I do not propose to discuss. I do not know, and for the present purpose I do not care. But whenever the principle is sought to be established in this Government that the Executive can set himself up and set up his office against the will of Congress, then we have come to a bad pass. The experiment has been tried by the Executive, in defiance of Congress, of keeping an officer in his place; and if we mean to stand by the privileges of the House and of Congress, and the right of the people to control the Executive and to direct this Government—for here at last must that power reside—then we must vote against this appropriation. I would vote against it were this the best man personally that could live, or were the President who undertook the experiment the best man personally that could live. I set Andrew Johnson aside in this matter; I set Harvey aside; but I say it is for us to stand by the right of the people through their Representatives and Senators to direct the expenditures of the Government of the United States, and to determine whether an officer shall be kept in at home or abroad. Under the British constitution a single vote in the House of Commons of a want of confidence in an officer sends him out of the service. Year after year in succession this House voted a want of confidence in that executive officer, and we are now asked to stultify ourselves and to give him a salary when he has been kept in office, and has remained in that office in defiance of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. This House has voted a want of confidence in the President of the United States. Why, then, does not the gentleman refuse to appropriate money to pay his salary?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will tell you why. Because we put that vote of want of confidence before the only tribunal known to the Constitution; and wrongly, as I believe, but whether right or wrong, we were overruled, and he was kept in office by the verdict of that tribunal to which we appealed and he appealed. But here is another and a different case. It is an officer appointed, and we meet him in the only way we could, by withholding the appropriation for his support; and having done that it was the duty of the Executive—his bounden constitutional duty, according to the theory of our Government—to withdraw him. If he chose he had the power to keep the man there, and the man had the power to stay. We have the power to say if you stay you stay at your own expense.

Mr. BENTON. I do not know but that I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in his position upon this question, but I would ask him whether a portion of the salary of this gentleman was not due at the time Congress refused to make the appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; I understand not.

Mr. BENTON. The amount of salary due him was paid?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENTON. Then I do not see any reason why we should make this appropriation now.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from California all but one minute of my time.

Mr. HIGBY. I believe I was a member of the House of Representatives at the time we refused to make an appropriation to pay Mr. Harvey, the minister to Portugal, and I think, like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I have failed to hear any new information upon this subject. We had full information, which we supposed to be correct, and upon which we acted at that time. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that an error should be corrected, and that when we find we have acted wrongly and that what we supposed were facts were really false we ought to retrace our steps. But I do not understand from him that we have any other information in regard to the conduct of this man different from that which we had before us when we acted as a deliberative body in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. We then acted coolly and deliberately upon the information which we received; and now upon the same statement of facts we are called upon to retrace our steps and take back what we then did. I do not understand from the gentleman from Ohio or from any other member of the Committee on Appropriations that there is any difference between the facts before this body now and the facts upon which we then acted. I then acted upon my judgment, without any passion, without any prejudice, and what I did then I am disposed to stand by now.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman from California will allow me to say that this gentleman, Mr. Harvey, has been home and has been before the Committee on Appropriations, and has disclaimed meaning to cast any imputation upon Congress.

Mr. HIGBY. It seems, then, that this man admitted when he was before the Committee on Appropriations that what was stated then was correct, but he finds that he has placed himself in a position where he can get no pay, unless he asks the pardon of Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now ask the unanimous consent of the committee that the debate upon this paragraph be closed.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. UPSON's amendment, to strike out the word "for" at the beginning of the paragraph; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment to strike out the paragraph; and being put, there were—ayes 60, noes 57.

Mr. SPALDING called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. JULIAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment:

For necessary repairs and furniture for the office of register of deeds in the District of Columbia, $350.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line one hundred and ninety-seven:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for certain clerks in the Treasury Department, $50,000.

I am told that this is absolutely necessary to keep the wheels of Government in motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is not that the same as an amendment which we voted down last night?

Mr. SPALDING. It is entirely different. It is very necessary to enable the Treasury Department to carry on its operations, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My point of order is that this paragraph is not for a deficiency but for a private claim, which should not be put in a deficiency bill. It is also legislation in an appropriation bill providing how the money shall be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that this bill, according to its title, is not only for supplying deficiencies but "for other purposes."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I move to strike out this entire paragraph. I want to understand something about all this money being expended under the direction of this Rev. Mr. Whipple, whoever he is; I do not know who he is.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out will be entertained; but the question must be first taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MULLINS. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is not definite enough; it merely says "for certain clerks," without stating what kind of or how many clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING; and upon a division there were—ayes eighteen.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. SPALDING said: I will withdraw the amendment and offer it in the House.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn. The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH to strike out the following:

For the relief of the two bands of Sisseton and Wahpeton Sioux Indians, on the reservations at Lake Traverse and Devil's Lake, Dakota Territory, to be expended under the direction of Rev. H. B. Whipple in the purchase of tools, food, seeds, cattle, agricultural implements, and other articles necessary for Indians and for the construction of houses, $60,000: Provided, That the said Whipple shall make a full, detailed, and accurate statement to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs (who shall transmit the same to Congress) of the manner in which the amount hereby appropriated has been expended.

For compensation of H. B. Whipple for his services as above, $1,500.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that it is entirely improper to appropriate money to be expended under the direction of any person by name without naming the office he holds. Suppose he should die, who would then expend the money?

Mr. BROMWELL. Does this specify any bond to be given by this Mr. Whipple?

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have been instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to add to the bill the following:

For defraying the expenses incurred in negotiating the treaty made with the Tabeguache, Maquache, Capote, Weeminucke, Yampa, Grand River, and Uintah bands of the Indians, on the 2d of March, 1868, and in procuring the consent of said Indians to the Senate amendments thereto, $9,286 77.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend this bill by adding to it the following:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That $5,000 be, and is hereby, added to the appropriation for the Agricultural Department to purchase new and valuable seeds and put them up for distribution, so as to make the whole appropriation for that purpose $25,000.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the committee now rise and report this bill to the House with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PRICE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

ENROLLED BILL, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1966) for the relief of Foster and Tower; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 460) in relation to the meeting of the House of Representatives at the first session of the Forty-First Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes, as the unfinished business pending at the time of taking the recess yesterday, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, &c.

Mr. LAFLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge whether, in view of the pressing necessity for the early consideration of the resolution in regard to the reporting and publishing of the congressional debates, he is not willing that we should now postpone the further consideration of this bill and proceed at once to act upon the joint resolution which has come from the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that we are acting on this bill under the operation of the previous question, and that I could not consent to the gentleman's proposition, even if I were disposed to do so.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill under the operation of the previous question. This is a very long bill, which ought to be sent to the Senate as early as possible. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] that the previous question has not been called upon the deficiency appropriation bill just reported to the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read the report as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 1, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 8, 9, 17, 18, 20, and 26; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: strike out said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "two million five hundred thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twenty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: in line eleven of said amendment strike out the word "sixteen;" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: in line five of said amendment strike out the words "as authorities," and insert in lieu thereof "and of any other act authorizing;" and the Senate agree to the same.

R. P. SPALDING,

CHAS. E. PHELPS,

F. A. PIKE,

Managers on the part of the House.

J. W. GRIMES,

J. W. NYE,

T. A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the previous question on agreeing to this report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. AXTELL obtained leave of absence for Saturday and Monday next, on account of being obliged to leave the city.

DEPUTY COLLECTORS, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors and assessors having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same. They further agree and recommend that the title be changed, so as to read: "An act to allow deputy collectors of internal revenue acting as collectors the pay of collectors, and for other purposes."

ALEXANDER G. CATTELL,

WILLARD WARNER,

J. S. MORRILL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,

LEONARD MYERS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to know, and I suppose the House would like to know, what is the result of the conference as to assistant assessors acting as assessors?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state the position of the matter. The House passed a bill providing that deputy collectors who have performed or may hereafter perform the duties of collectors should receive the pay of collectors for the time during which such service was rendered if the collector had not received pay for the same time. The Senate amended so as to leave out that part relating to assistant assessors—retaining the part relating to deputy collectors. We were at first disposed not to agree to this; but on investigating the subject we found, so far as the deputy collectors were concerned, it was obviously necessary that they should be provided for; because they are not officers of the Government unless made so by being taken up and made acting collectors. The same rule does not apply to the same extent to the assistant assessors. Assistant assessors are officers appointed by the Government. They receive five dollars a day. If the assistant assessor became acting assessor he would still have his five dollars a day.

Then we found, from matters brought before the Committee of Ways and Means, that the rule is not now as it was before. Disbursing agents of the Treasury under the law inform us, and this we also found out upon conference with the Senate, that they have established a rule to pay all the incidental expenses, such as office rent, &c., applicable to an assistant assessor acting as assessor. It was originally complained of that the assistant assessor acting as assessor did not have those expenses allowed, and on inquiry we find that they now do. In view of this difference we consented to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this subject. I know that the business of the House is pressing, but I will not detain it long. I think the whole life has been driven out of this bill by the conference committee giving up the most important part of it. I venture to say here, sir, that if there is anything to be given the assistant assessors require it more than the deputy collectors. The collectors of the revenue are better paid than any assessors. As to traveling expenses and other things, they have no reference to assistant assessors in the cities, as they incur no traveling expenses. If they travel it is in the street cars.

Mr. Speaker, I do invite the attention of the House to this report of the conference committee. If the bill is not to include assistant assessors then the most meritorious part of it is omitted. I would be ashamed to stand here and advocate a bill when the most meritorious part of it is stricken out, the part in reference to the pay of these assistant assessors, for which purpose it was originally passed. I do most earnestly desire that the House will non-concur in the report of the committee of conference, but that the subject will be sent back to another committee of conference so that justice may be done to these meritorious assistant assessors. In this report they are left out and provision is only made in favor of deputy collectors.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MYERS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was one of the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York will give me his attention for a moment I think he will alter his views. I was on the conference committee and entertained the views he has expressed. Let me state the facts which led us to the conclusion which we have reported. At the first blush it would appear as if assistant assessors and deputy collectors should be placed upon a par in the bill, but the fact is that the collector himself pays his deputy out of the money allowed him. If a deputy collector act as collector in case of a vacancy not provided for at all, as the law stands he is not an officer of the Government and cannot get any pay. Several instances of the kind have happened, one I recollect in the district of my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY.] There a deputy collector acted as collector for two months during a vacancy, and in that time received and paid over to the Government $100,000, but up to this time he has not received any pay for his services. The case is different with an assistant assessor acting as assessor during a vacancy. That is an officer provided for by law. He gets five dollars a day. The question was whether we should pay the assistant assessor who acted as chief assessor an additional sum for that time. Now, the ground the Senate conferees took, and it was not a bad one, was that if we adopt the rule in regard to officers of the revenue we shall have to pursue it in regard to officers of the Army as well as other officers in the civil service. The major who acts as colonel on the resignation or death of the latter, or the colonel who acts as brigadier general for a short time, may just as well demand the pay of the higher officer. So we concluded that deputy collectors not getting pay under the law if they act as collectors should be provided for, while assistant assessors, who are already provided for by law and who get their regular pay at least, need not be included. The conferees on the part of the House, it is proper to add, endeavored to include both, but for the reasons stated finally concurred in the action of the Senate.

One thing more remains to be stated. It is the objection, which at first sight seems to be a pertinent one, mentioned by the gentleman from New York; that is, that the assistant assessors acting in the higher capacity will have some further expenses. We had, however, before the conference committee a letter of Comptroller Taylor, who has decided that under the law as it stands the assistant assessors thus acting can be paid for their office expenses and stationery, &c., and I think traveling expenses under his reasoning would be included; therefore there is no further need of legislation on that point. In this view we deemed it best not to establish a new principle by the bill, but merely provided for something that was omitted in the present law.

Mr. ROBINSON. A single word further. I appreciate the value of the time of the House and shall not trespass but a moment. Every argument that my friend has used against giving anything to the assistant assessors would apply equally to the deputy collectors. Their expenses are paid and their stationery is paid for, and yet they are to get additional pay for the time they spend in carrying on the office in the absence of the principal. I can state on my own observation that I know assistant assessors who get five dollars a day and have had to work additional hours, sitting up till after midnight performing the duties of assessors, working sometimes sixteen hours a day to make up for the deficiency of the principal. Now, if you make the argument that you might as well pay a colonel who acts as brigadier general the pay of the latter why do you here commence to make a distinction at all? Will not the argument that you should pay a deputy collector for his additional service be the same as applied to a colonel for his additional or higher service, or as applied to an assistant assessor who does the work of his principal? Sir, I trust the report of the committee of conference will be voted down, for the most meritorious part of the bill is stricken out.

Mr. MYERS. I think the House understands the matter fully and that the cases are very different, and with that I leave the question.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, the Chair understood, had taken his seat and resigned the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not intend to give up the floor. I yielded to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and then to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. COVODE. Allow me one minute.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will do so.

Mr. COVODE. I desire to state that the assessor in my district, who has done the entire duties of the office for more than a year since the death of the principal, and whose business amounts to more than that of any other district in the State outside of the city of Philadelphia, has only been drawing the pay of assistant assessor. I hope equal justice will be done to the assessors with the collectors.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] does not seem to apprehend the distinction precisely between deputy collectors and deputy assessors. Deputy collectors are not officers of the law at all. The collector is responsible for the whole collection of the taxes and he employs at his pleasure his own assistants, paying them out of his own pocket.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. SCHENCK. The consequence is that some provision is absolutely necessary in case of the death, resignation, or other occasional vacancy in the office of collector, because the deputy collector succeeding to the duties of collector would have no chief, no principal, nobody to pay him. He is not recognized by the Government, is not an officer of the Government, and hence we, by the amendment which we now propose, make him so for the purpose of supplying such vacancy and providing payment for it when it occurs. The assistant assessor is also an officer of the law as well as the assessor. He gets his five dollars a day for his services in his sub-district or general district. If he be transferred to the office of assessor to fill a vacancy he still is an assistant assessor acting as assessor, and gets five dollars a day all the time he is employed.

We have received complaints, however, from assistant assessors in some cases that they were not allowed extra pay for expenses occasioned by their transfer to the office of assessor. For instance, I hold in my hand a letter written in June last by a man of the name of Harrison, of the second district in Indiana, in which he says:

"Since the 4th of March, 1867, I have been performing the duties of assistant or division assessor for this county, as well as acting assessor for this district, without any extra pay or remuneration whatever, and there are divers expenses connected with the assessor's office, such as office furniture, traveling, fuel, lights, &c., borne by the person filling the office. These I have had to pay myself, at the same time receiving only the pay of an assistant assessor."

The advantage he has is that he receives five dollars a day for all the time instead of five dollars a day for the time that he is employed, and they have established now a rule under a proper construction of the law, as they claim, and I suppose it is, to pay these assessors for all these expenses. Here is a letter from the First Comptroller of the Treasury Department, stating what the practice is, and he states that all these expenses are now paid. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Allow me to say one word. The deputy collectors are paid higher rates all through the country than these assistant assessors. That is all.

Mr. SCHENCK. They have a vast deal more of responsibility.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to—ayes one hundred and two, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 284) for the relief of N. A. Shuttleworth of Harrison county, West Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 1128) for the relief of Isaac Watts;

An act (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of George Kaiser; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1678 making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with sundry amendments.

The next amendment, upon which a separate vote was asked by Mr. MOORHEAD, was the following:

Fifteenth amendment:

Page 22, at the end of line five hundred and twenty-three, insert the following:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid as salary or compensation to the Special Commissioner of the Revenue after June 1, 1870.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. I rise for the purpose of withdrawing that amendment, and I will say to the House in doing it that my object was entirely accomplished in offering the amendment. I know it is unpleasant to vote to take away a man's salary, and I was somewhat astonished at the emphatic rebuke that was given by the House to the Special Commissioner by adopting the amendment. But having observed the argument of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] the friend of the Special Commissioner, which I shall ask to have read, I am willing that this amendment shall be withdrawn, and I will not introduce a bill to abolish this office. I now ask the Clerk to read the extract from the speech of the gentleman from Iowa, which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"I call on the gentlemen who intend to vote against this Special Commissioner of the Revenue to remember that we are about to have a change of Administration, and is it possible that a majority of this House, having faith in the incoming President, believe that if we now have an officer who is unfit for the discharge of his duties the President will not remove him and put in his place another man capable of discharging the important duties that we have imposed upon him by law? Therefore I trust we will at least continue the appropriation for eleven months of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Having full confidence that the next Administration, after the strong expression of the House, will do as the gentleman says, I am willing that the amendment shall be withdrawn and the next Congress take action on abolishing the office.

By unanimous consent the amendment was withdrawn.

Seventeenth amendment, upon which a separate vote was asked by Mr. HOLMAN.

Page 23, after line five hundred and forty-four, insert:

Office of Education: For Commissioner of Education, $3,000; for clerk of class one, $2,400; for contingent expenses, $600, $5,000.

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to—ayes 76, noes 39.

The following amendment was read:

Strike out the following clause:

For surveyor general of Utah Territory, $3,000, and the clerks in his office, $4,000.

Mr. PRICE. That amendment was made on my motion. I made the motion under a misapprehension, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When in the Committee of the Whole an amendment was adopted fixing the pay of female clerks at $1,200 a year—in the bill a lower salary had been fixed—I then stated that if the House adopted the amendment of the Committee of the Whole I would ask leave to have the various sums named in the bill so changed as to meet the new rate of pay for female clerks. I now ask unanimous consent that the various sums be changed to correspond with that amendment which has been adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that it would be as well to adopt a general provision appropriating so much money as may be necessary for the purpose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill must be corrected in several places. For instance, in one place it provides for twenty female clerks $13,000; whereas it should now read $24,000. I propose to have the bill corrected to correspond with the action of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that. No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

The following amendment was read:

Strike out "$10,000" and insert "$15,000" in the following clause:

Agricultural statistics:

For collecting statistics and material for annual report, $10,000.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. SCOTFIELD called for a separate vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to, on a division—ayes 68, noes 45.

The following amendment was read:

Strike out the following:

Branch mint at Denver:

For assayer, (who shall have charge of the said mint,) $1,800.

For melter and refiner and coiner, at $1,800 each, $3,600.

For two clerks, at $1,800 each, $3,600.

For wages of workmen, $12,000.

For incidental and contingent expenses, $3,000; Provided, That after the last day of July, 1869, the branch mint at Denver shall be carried on as an assay office only, and all unexpended balance of appropriations shall be paid and covered into the Treasury of the United States, and all the offices not herein provided for are hereby abolished.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Branch mint at Denver:

For superintendent, $2,000; assayer, $1,800; melter and refiner, $1,800; three clerks, one of whom shall act as clerk to the Assistant Treasurer of the United States of the branch mint, $5,400; wages of workmen, $11,000; incidental and contingent expenses, $2,400; additional salary of superintendent for services as Assistant Treasurer of the United States, $500, or so much thereof as shall be necessary; Provided, The entire expenses of the branch mint at Denver for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to have a separate vote on this amendment. The Committee on Appropriations, from information received from the officers of the Mint at Philadelphia, and, as I understand, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of this House, came to the conclusion that it was best to do away with these small mints where the expense was largely out of proportion to the amount of work done. In order that the people in the region of Denver should have all the benefit it would give we recommended closing the mint at that place and continuing the establishment as an assay office, and we reported an appropriation for that purpose.

Some gentleman with a local interest in the mint offered this amendment, which was agreed to in Committee of the Whole, with the understanding that a separate vote should be taken upon it in the House; and I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to ask that this amendment be not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] if the amendment offered by the Delegate from Colorado [Mr. CHILCOTT] increases the appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It increases it largely.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it makes it the same, or perhaps a few hundred dollars less.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It adds the machinery of a mint to the assay office.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman will find that the appropriation is about the same. The committee report an appropriation of $1,800 for a coiner. This amendment makes the same appropriation for a superintendent; and then the people there will have the advantage of a depository at Denver, which they cannot have if it is merely an assay office.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I resume the floor, and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. As chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I have, under the instructions of that committee, prepared and reported a bill to reduce the mint at Denver City to an assay office. I hold in my hand a letter from the Treasury Department, to which I invite the attention of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] From that letter it appears that the total amount of bullion deposited in the branch mint at Denver during the year 1866 was $160,982 94; in 1867 it was $130,559 70; in 1868 it was $357,935 11. The largest amount ever deposited there was $541,559 04, in the year 1864.

This letter further states that the total expense of conducting this institution from November 20, 1862, when it was first established, to the close of the last fiscal year was $235,611 34; while the total receipts for the same period were only $9,512 89. In other words we have expended in round numbers $235,000 in order to earn $9,500. The letter further states that no coinage has ever been executed at Denver and no appropriation has ever been made to procure apparatus and machinery for that purpose. It thus appears that the whole sum which this amendment proposes to appropriate is to be expended in maintaining sinecure offices—offices the duties of which cannot be performed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is laboring under a very great mistake, as I shall be able to show him. The bill as it stands appropriates $26,300. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado appropriates only $24,900, being a reduction of $1,400. One word more. The bill provides for a coiner. I believe it is admitted on all hands that a coiner is not necessary, that no coining has ever been done at this mint and there is no expectation that any will be done. Still the bill as it stands provides for a coiner with a salary of $1,800 a year. This officer should of course be dispensed with.

I agree that these expenses ought to be reduced, and the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado proposes a very manifest reduction. I think the effect of the amendment has been entirely misapprehended. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will not overlook the fact that the proposition of the gentleman from Colorado will keep at this place as a Government depository an officer of the sub-Treasury, while there is still a reduction of the expenditure proposed in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield for further debate. The facts are before the House.

Mr. BARNES. Will not the gentleman allow me three minutes?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield for any further discussion of this subject.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 31, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN of Massachusetts and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole having all been acted on the Clerk will now report the amendment offered in the House by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following as a new section: Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, laborers, and other persons, male and female now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, Treasury, Navy, War, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office, the city post office, and the bureaus and branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $1,500 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received by them respectively during the past and present fiscal years; and that the necessary amount to pay the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. To this amendment an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.] It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the words "city post office" the following: "The clerks, carriers, and employees, male and female, in the Philadelphia post office."

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire merely to state the operation of these amendments, and then I will call for a vote.

The House, by a vote which it is not now my province to question, has raised the pay of all the female clerks in the Departments to $1,200 a year, and the pay of all the watchmen, &c., to $720. It is now proposed to add ten per cent. to the pay of all the clerks, male and female, and all others employed in any of the Departments at Washington for a year past and a year hence. This would bring up the pay of all the female clerks to $1,400.

Mr. WARD. And it amounts to twenty per cent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; it amounts to twenty per cent.

Mr. AXTELL. Does not the increased pay of the female clerks apply to the coming fiscal year, and is not this ten per cent. for the last year and the present year?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. For the last year and the next year.

Mr. AXTELL. No; it is for the last year and this year; and the increase of the pay of the female clerks is for the next fiscal year.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand differently.

Now, the simple question is whether the House is ready to adopt the amendment now pending. We are asked to legislate this increase to men and women who have in many cases got their pay and gone home satisfied. We propose to pay those who are out of office as well as those still in office this increase for the past and the future, for the next year and for last year. And yet we are doing that in the name of the country.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is not quite correct in stating the effect of the amendment agreed upon in the House last evening. That amendment is in these words:

The compensation of the female clerks authorized by this section shall be the same as of clerks of the first class, and where employed on work performed by clerks of the higher classes they shall receive like compensation with the other clerks of such classes.

It will be seen, therefore, it only applies to the clerks "authorized by this section." I did not have the entire bill before me when the vote was taken on this amendment, and in the confusion which will sometimes unavoidably prevail in this Hall the amendment may not have been fully understood. But it is, if I am not mistaken, limited, as stated, to some sixty female clerks, who perform the same duties as male clerks in the same Department. I know of no reason why a female who performs official services should not receive the same pay as a man for the same or like services. The true rule, it seems to me, is to measure services by their value, not by the sex of the person performing them. There are some females employed in the Departments whose services are not of the value of a first-class clerk, and they should not receive so much pay. Then there are others who are performing services requiring a degree of skill rarely attainable by men, and they should be paid for such skilled labor without regard to sex "or previous condition." General Spinner, the Treasurer, showed me the charred remains of some millions of greenbacks and bank notes being separated and denominations ascertained by the skill of female clerks of so high an order that men could rarely attain it.

Then, there are services to be performed by men requiring no skill at all, and for which no just rule would give equal compensation with that skilled labor which has cost years of toil to attain. I am opposed to raising the salary of any officer, clerk, or employé of the Government; so far as I now know I will not vote to increase any, but I would vote to fix by law a just salary for officers, clerks, and employés, generally reducing most of the salaries now paid; and I would fix the compensation by a just rule having reference to the value of the services required. Then, I would not inquire as to the sex of the person performing them, but I would select such persons as would render the most and the best services of the kind required regardless of all other considerations, except only those founded on services to the country and the claims of charity, not inconsistent with the public interests. But the government that would pay for services according to sex—giving a man twice as much pay as a woman for the same work—is a compound of meanness and dishonesty unworthy of the respect of any man who ever had a mother, any husband having a wife who may become a widow, or any father having a daughter who may in the present or the future be required to earn a support by honest industry in official employment or otherwise. Let us be just, and then let us inaugurate a system of retrenchment and economy which will save millions to the people. I have always so voted and will continue so to vote.

I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that we ought to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] I have always voted against all propositions to add a percentage to salaries. It is wrong in principle. Salaries should be fixed by law. The Republican party came into power on pledges of retrenchment and economy. Let these pledges be fulfilled. The country expects it, and for one I demand that our professions and our practice shall correspond.

Mr. CHANLER rose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not yield. The last time I yielded to him he insulted me.

Mr. CHANLER. And you were worthy of the insult.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, two years ago this House passed a resolution giving twenty per cent. to these employés, and the Committee on Retrenchment called on the various Departments for a statement of the expenditure under that resolution. I hold in my hand the figures, and it appears from them that the aggregate amount paid was $1,638,142.

A MEMBER. What is that?

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is the aggregate amount of the twenty per cent. extra pay we voted to these employés two years ago. It was over one million and a half dollars. It is true that this resolution on its face is only for ten per cent., but gentlemen must recollect that it applies for two years, which is virtually voting them twenty per cent.

Mr. POLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the twenty per cent. did not reach a much higher class of clerks?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was about to say that this resolution was not as comprehensive but it will make but little difference in the aggregate amount. There are but few clerks between $1,800 and $2,500. I believe there is a restriction here that this shall only apply to those below $1,800. The restriction before was below $3,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the House to the amendment. It is as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, or other persons, male and female, now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office and city post office and the bureaus or branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $2,500 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received or that shall be received by them respectively during the past and present fiscal years; and that the necessary amount to pay the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I now call for the vote.

Mr. WARD. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offered this amendment at the solicitation of a committee on behalf of the clerks of the Departments. I said to them I thought it was just and right they should have an opportunity to have this question fairly brought before the House, that they might have the judgment of the House upon it, and for that purpose I would offer it, but I would not advocate it. The subject had been up and debated several times. It had been discussed in the public press by Mr. Greeley and his journal on the one side arguing against it, and by other journals arguing in its favor. As the House well understood the question I told them that I would not trouble myself or the House with debating it at all.

Mr. Speaker, the salaries of these clerks is the same now as before the war and for many years before that. I think every man in this House will agree that these salaries are now very insufficient and incompetent, or were very much too large when they were established, for every man who has lived in Washington or lived anywhere in the United States knows that the cost of living has doubled in that time—that it has increased here more than anywhere else.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the cost of living is increased any more in Washington than it is everywhere else throughout the country?

Mr. POLAND. I think it is in a much greater proportion. Therefore, if these salaries were not very much too large when they were established, they are very much too small now. But, as I had occasion to say to the House a day or two ago on the question of judges' salaries, I do not believe this is a good time to permanently raise salaries. We hope to get back to the good old times or pretty near to them at some time. Therefore it was that two years ago instead of raising these salaries Congress said they would make a temporary provision. So they added twenty per cent. to the pay of the clerks, and instead of stopping at the low figure of $1,800 they went up to $3,000. This proposition is only to pay ten per cent. to those who have $1,800 or less.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] to close debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire to say this: that inasmuch as I was called into this debate indirectly, at least, by the gentleman from Vermont, in reference to a statement I made the other night, and inasmuch as that statement is disputed, I repeat it, and am ready to confirm it by the head of the bureau. That statement was that eighteen clerks had been discharged for various reasons in a certain bureau in the Treasury Department; that they were sent back by the Secretary, and the head of the bureau said he did not want them, and would not have them, and they were then transferred to the Third Auditor's department.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Permit me to make a statement in that connection.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Second Auditor of the Treasury told me he had fifty clerks in his office that he had no earthly use for.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I call attention to this fact. About the same time that we passed a law raising the clerks' pay twenty per cent. we also raised the pay of certain officers of the Army and Navy thirty-three per cent., with the understanding that the increase was to stop. Now, I ask gentlemen who have been here since that time if they have not been besieged by these clerks for this twenty per cent. and by Army officers for their thirty-three per cent., and if you have not refused to reenact the law? You have reenacted the law giving thirty-three per cent. to a portion of the Navy officers; but I hope Congress will take it off from all and leave the amount of pay fixed. If the clerks do not get enough, raise their salaries by law, but do not increase it by a percentage. There is one clerk who was appointed when I first came here, on my recommendation. He was a captain in the Army, and served four years.

He was a young lawyer who studied in my office. He now gets $1,200 a year and does not ask any more. He says it is more than he ever got as a lawyer, and he is a good lawyer, too.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 81, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Beck, Benjamin, Blair, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Clift, Corley, Deweese, Dockery, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—54.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, stated that Mr. PERRIS had been obliged to leave the Hall on account of sickness, and he had paired with him on this question. Mr. PERRIS would have voted "ay," and he, Mr. ELIOT, "no."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BENTON and Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 92, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beck, Blair, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Clift, Corley, Deweese, Dockery, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, James T. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Banks, Barnum, Caine, Chanler, Dickey, Dodge, Driggs, Edwards, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, Garfield, Goss, Haight, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kellogg, Kitchen, Lash, Loan, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, Morrissey, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Pettis, Pile, Polsley, Randall, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sypher, Taffe, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—48.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. POLAND. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I renew it.

Mr. POLAND. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Unless it be objected to, as it is obvious that this bill cannot be disposed of before half past four o'clock, the Chair will rule that it will be the first business in order this evening on account of the importance of its reaching the Senate at the earliest possible moment. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the recess.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

The question was taken on Mr. BENJAMIN's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 69, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomfield, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Eckley, Ela, James T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Wood, Woodward, and Young—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Banks, Barnum, Caine, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Edwards, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gove, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kitchen, Lash, Loan, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morrissey, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Pettis, Phelps, Polsley, Randall, Roots, Ross, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Sypher, Taffe, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—57.

So the motion to reconsider prevailed; and the question recurred on agreeing to the amendment.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors of internal revenue acting as collectors the pay of collectors, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence from the evening session was granted to Mr. KNOTT and Mr. RAUM on account of indisposition.

The hour of half past four o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock p. m.

TAQUINA BAY, OREGON.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a letter from the Committee on Appropriations, relative to a light-house at the mouth of Taquina bay, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PARAGUAYAN DIFFICULTIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting additional papers relative to the Paraguayan difficulties; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1673, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] The amendment was adopted; then the House refused to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted, and then reconsidered the vote adopting the amendment. The question again recurs upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following:

SEC.—And be it further enacted, That the clerks, messengers, watchmen, laborers, and other persons, male and female, now employed at Washington, District of Columbia, at a salary fixed by law or by regulations of a Department, in the State, Treasury, Navy, War, Interior, Agricultural, and Post Office Departments, including the Attorney General's office, the city post office, and the bureaus and branches of the several Departments herein named, who are paid at a rate not exceeding $1,800 per annum, shall be allowed an additional compensation of ten per cent. on the amount of salary or pay received by them respectively during the past and present fiscal years, and that the necessary amount to pay the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. POLAND. As the vote will undoubtedly result in the yeas and nays, I call for them now.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 86, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Beck, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Clift, Deweese, Eldridge, Golladay, Gove, Higby, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Mallory, Marshall, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Newsham, O'Neill, Perham, Pierce, Poland, Prince, Robertson, Robinson, Spaulding, Stokes, Taber, Thomas, Twichell, Van Auker, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomfield, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Ela, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Mullins, Newcomb, Orth, Peters, Pike, Plants, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stover, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Caine, Cary, Churchill, Coburn, Corley, Dickey, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Fox, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gravely, Grover, Hamilton, Haughey, Heaton, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Knott, Lash, Lincoln, Marvin, McCullough, Miller, Morrissey, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Paine, Pettis, Phelps, Pile, Polsley, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Roots, Ross, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, Windom, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—86.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. FOX said: On this question I am paired with Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. If he were here he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Can this vote be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. It cannot. It has been once reconsidered, which exhausts the power of the House in that respect.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was going to change my vote if this could be reconsidered; as it cannot I will not do so.

The last amendment was one offered by Mr. HOLMAN, to add to the bill the following:

And be it further enacted, That the sum necessary to pay the compensation of the female clerks, as provided for in the first section of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think it is necessary to adopt this amendment now, inasmuch as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURRER] asked and obtained unanimous consent to have the bill changed in various places to correspond to an amendment adopted by the House upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in accordance with the order of the House, has instructed the engrossing clerk to make the necessary changes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MUNGEN. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were nine in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered. The bill was then passed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASYLUM FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the board of managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, presented from the Committee on Naval Affairs a report relative to the purchase by Theodore Zeller, engineer of the Philadelphia navy-yard, of certain tools and machinery; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLEY, on the part of a minority of the same committee, presented, by unanimous consent, a minority report on the same subject; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with an arrangement that has been made I yield for half an hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] that he may bring before the House the joint resolution from the Senate relative to reporting and publishing the debates. I yield on the condition that if at the end of half an hour the business of the gentleman from New York should not be concluded the House shall resume the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. That understanding will be carried out, unless at the expiration of the time named the House should be engaged in taking the yeas and nays, in which case the roll-call could not be interrupted.

PUBLICATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 231) providing for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why should it not be considered in the House?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, and read the first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the joint Committee of Congress on Public Printing is hereby authorized to contract on behalf of the General Government with Rives & Bailey for the reporting and publication of the debates of Congress for the term of two years on and from the 4th day of March, 1869: Provided, That before the United States shall be called on to pay for any reporting or the publication of the debates the accounts therefor shall be submitted to the joint Committee on Public Printing or to such other officer or officers of Congress as they may designate, and on their or his approbation thereof, as being in all respects according to the contracts, it shall be paid for from the Treasury of the United States, after having passed the proper accounting officers thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That in case the joint Committee on Public Printing are unable to conclude a satisfactory contract with the said Rives & Bailey, or that they be unable to fulfill any contract that they may make, the joint Committee on Public Printing be authorized to have the debates reported and printed under the direction of the Congressional Printer at the Government Printing Office.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose aforesaid there be appropriated and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, as I am permitted by the Committee on Appropriations, under the press of business before the House, to occupy but the short period of thirty minutes, and as this is a subject in which are involved the rights and privileges of each member I trust I shall not be considered immodest if I bespeak for what I may have to offer upon this subject the careful and earnest attention of every member. I shall endeavor to present to the House, in as close and succinct a manner as I can command, the facts in this case; and I believe that if each member will give strict attention to what I shall say no friend of either of the plans proposed for reporting and publishing the debates in Congress will have any reason to complain of the position which I occupy with reference to this joint resolution.

In the first place, that the House may clearly understand what our committee propose to lay before them, I will state the amendments which the Committee on Printing have instructed me to offer to this joint resolution. In line five I shall move to insert after the words "Rives & Bailey" the words "or J. T. Crowell;" so that it will read—

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, acknowledging the courtesy that is due to every member of this House, I trust that no one will consider me guilty of discourtesy if, with only thirty minutes allowed me to explain a bill involving an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, I shall decline to yield.

Mr. COVODE. Is this the Crowell whom I put through in my investigation as one of the parties who were engaged in the Kansas frauds? [Great laughter.]

Mr. KERR. Of course it is the same man. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LAFLIN. If the House will give me the opportunity I will answer all questions and endeavor to vindicate the amendments I shall propose. The amendments I offer are as follows:

In line five, after the words "Rives & Bailey," insert "or J. T. Crowell."

In line three, section two, also after the words "Rives & Bailey," insert "or J. T. Crowell."

At the end of the joint resolution add these words: "And to issue new proposals for reporting and publishing the debates in Congress;" and in line three strike out "$350,000," and in lieu thereof insert "$250,000."

Mr. Speaker, the present contract for reporting and publishing the debates in Congress as provided by law will expire on the 4th of March next. In anticipation of that fact, at the close of the July session, the Committee on Printing were empowered to issue advertisements for proposals for the reporting and publication of the debates in Congress. On the 4th of January last that committee issued such advertisements, and the proposals were opened on the 14th day of January last. At the same time that they called for these proposals they asked the Congressional Printer to submit, for the guidance of the committee, an estimate of the probable cost of this reporting and publication in connection with the Government Printing Office. When these proposals were opened it was found that there were two private bidders: one was made by the present proprietors of the Globe, Messrs. Rives & Bailey, and the other by J. T. Crowell, of Rahway, New Jersey. In order that we might properly comprehend the meaning of these bids, the terms used being so technical in their character that it was difficult for the committee to decipher them, we submitted them to an expert in the Government Printing Office, and for the purpose of definitely determining the character of these bids we directed that expert to determine the comparative merits of these bids upon the basis of the debates that were reported for the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Taking that as the basis we found, as reported to us by this expert, this to be the case. And right here I want every man in this House, and especially the reporters for the Associated Press, clearly to understand what I have to say and to listen closely to the explanation I have to make; for this has become the subject of newspaper discussion and very erroneous impressions abroad touching the character of these bids. I shall endeavor to speak with as much accuracy as the documents before me and the investigation we have made will fully warrant.

These bids as first reported to us show this to be the fact: the proposal of Rives & Bailey, the present proprietors of the Daily Globe, was, on the basis of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, $389,454 96. The proposition of Joseph T. Crowell, the other private bidder upon the same basis, was $261,149 80. The estimate, as furnished by the Congressional Printer for the same work, was $276,494 84. That we might be positive this expert had done his duty properly, we submitted the interpretation the expert had made to the bidder himself, submitting the interpretation of each bidder only to that bidder, and we received from each of these parties an explanation of this interpretation. Inasmuch as this interpretation must become part and parcel of any contract we may enter into with these parties it is due the House should be put in possession of it.

First of all I wish to say here that in making these estimates, both for the work to be done by the Congressional Printer and the work to be done by either of these private persons, there was included the sum of $16,000 paid to the reporters, a gratuity furnished by the House itself. It is included in all the estimates, and all that is necessary is to mention it.

As I stated before, the proposition of Messrs. Rives & Bailey, as interpreted by our expert, was $389,454 96. But in examining this report we found that the proprietors of the Globe had included in their estimate the furnishing of the paper by themselves, and that the Congressional Printer and Mr. Crowell had provided in their estimates for the furnishing of the paper by the Government. This, it will be seen, would make a very essential difference in the volume of the respective bids. But that I may properly compare the real merits of these bids we have made a schedule under which each party is to obtain his supply of paper from the Government. Again, it was found that Messrs. Rives & Bailey in their estimate had included the work connected with the binding of the Congressional Globe, while in the other two bids this work was to be done entirely by the Government. We adopted the same rule with reference to these bids in that case that we did in reference to paper; and in the statement which I am about making with reference to Messrs. Rives & Bailey I have made deductions from the gross amount which they say would be required to execute this work of all the excess of their estimates over and above the cost of paper, provided the same was to be furnished by the Government.

And right here I will say I am going to be met with this inquiry: why do you, when Messrs. Rives & Bailey submit to you a proposition to do this work and to furnish all this paper, allow their estimate to go before the House with the deductions which you have just said you should make? I will tell the House why we propose to do that. It is because—if gentlemen will examine the resolution of the joint Committee on Printing as the resolution passed the Senate and as we ask the House to adopt it—it simply authorizes, not directs the committee to enter into a contract either with this party or that party, or authorize them to have the work done at this place or that place, and the Senate took especial pains to strike out of the original resolution as it was presented to that body the words "in accordance with the proposition submitted by them." So that if this resolution passes this House as it passed the Senate the joint Committee on Printing would be authorized to go and make just the best contract they could with Messrs. Rives & Bailey, and failing to make a satisfactory contract with them, then they would be authorized to go and have the work done at the Government Printing Office.

Now, I assume in making this statement that if Messrs. Rives & Bailey find that they have overestimated the cost of the paper or the cost of printing and the committee say to them, "we prefer to furnish you our own paper, we prefer to do our own binding at our own office," they will accede to that proposition at once. So, therefore, we have made the deductions which are required according to this interpretation, and accordingly we find—and I take this from the statement submitted to the committee by Messrs. Rives & Bailey, in response to a letter which we addressed them—the excess that they estimate the paper will cost over and above the estimate we have given for the cost of paper in the other proposal would be $30,507 20 and the excess of binding would be $22,800 28, making together the sum of $52,807 48. If these premises are correct it would appear that the proposition of Messrs. Rives & Bailey should stand as follows: $336,447 48.

So much for the proposition of Messrs. Rives & Bailey. Now we come to the proposition of J. T. Crowell. The original terms, as I have stated before, of this proposition required the sum of $261,149 30. We submitted that estimate to Mr. Crowell and we asked him if the interpretation we placed upon his bid was correct. He returned us an answer, accompanied by a statement, which gave his interpretation of the contract. We have assumed that, then, to be the highest authority for the interpretation of his proposal. Assuming that to be so the estimate as given in this last paper by Mr. Crowell involves the expenditure of $184,993 43. To be added to that is the paper, which the Government is to furnish, and the expense of binding at the Government Office. We therefore add for this the sum allowed in the estimate that we last made of Messrs. Rives & Bailey:

For paper for quarto edition.....	$49,090 40
For binding.....	43,759 04
For paper for Daily Globe.....	15,000 00

Then we add for reporting, which is included in the other estimates, the sum of $16,000; so that his bid would stand in the aggregate $295,342 87. That is Mr. Crowell's bid.

Now, let us fairly understand this proposition. The estimate that was made at the Government Printing Office for this work involves an expenditure of $276,496 84; that of Mr. Crowell, $295,342 85; that of Messrs. Rives & Bailey, $336,647 48. It will be seen by this estimate that the Government Printing Office proposes to do the work less than the lowest estimate made by a private bidder by the sum of $18,846 08; or in other words, estimating the advantages of a private contract if we should choose to give the work to the lowest private bidder, he would contract for the work at a sum exceeding the governmental estimate $18,846 03. The Government Printing Office estimate is less than that of Rives & Bailey by the sum of $60,150 64; or in other words, if instead of giving it to the lowest private bidder we give it to the other private bidder, we exceed the Government estimate for the two years by the sum of $60,150 64. The difference between the two bids, comparing one private bid with the other, is this: the bid of Mr. Crowell is less than the bid of Rives & Bailey by the sum of $41,304 61.

Now, for the purpose of forming a little better estimate of the character of these bids, it is well for members to refer to the actual cost of this work as done by Messrs. Rives & Bailey under their present contract, for that we know because we have paid the money for it. I find that there was paid to Messrs. Rives & Bailey for reporting and publishing the debates of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the sum of $291,698 72. Now, how does this, the actual expenditure that was made at that time, compare with the bids of these two concerns? The bid of Mr. Crowell exceeds the sum that was paid Messrs. Rives & Bailey for doing that work $3,644 15, while the proposition of Messrs. Rives & Bailey exceeds the expense of the work as done by themselves during the Thirty-Ninth Congress by the sum of $44,948 76.

Mr. Speaker, I find that I shall not be able in the thirty minutes allowed me to go through with this statement, and I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] to allow me fifteen minutes longer to enable me to go through with it, and then when we have proposed these amendments the House will be prepared to act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's thirty minutes have expired.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have no objection to allowing the gentleman fifteen minutes more.

Mr. WOOD. My colleague [Mr. LAFLIN] seems to suppose that all the time yielded by the Committee on Appropriations is allotted to him. He is making a long speech and he will allow of no opportunity to reply to him, as he will occupy the whole time allowed for debate on and consideration of this question. Now, if the Committee on Appropriations give him thirty minutes or forty-five minutes, I submit that he should not occupy the whole time, but should give an opportunity for some gentlemen on other sides of the question to say something upon the subject, and therefore if forty-five minutes or an hour is allowed we shall certainly claim a portion of the time.

Mr. LAFLIN. Now, in this state of facts we find that the Senate has adopted a resolution which strikes out of this arrangement the lowest private bidder and simply puts it in the power of the Committee on Printing either to contract with Rives & Bailey or to send the work to the Government Printing Office. I think I am not transcending parliamentary rules when I state that the opinion shown in the Senate was decidedly in favor of giving the contract to the proprietors of the Globe.

Now, our committee feel that we ought not to be hampered in this way; that if we are to be intrusted with plenary power in regard to this matter we should be allowed to consider both the bid of Rives & Bailey and the bid of J. T. Crowell, and also the proposition whether the work shall go to the Public Printing Office or not; and in case we should come to the conclusion that the public interests demand that it shall go to the Public Printing Office we want to reserve to ourselves the right and authority to issue new proposals for reporting and publishing these debates, meaning thereby in case we adopt the latter policy that the arrangement at the Public Printing Office is to be merely temporary in its character; for the House must understand that unless some arrangement of this kind is made after the 4th of March next not a debate can be reported and of course none can be published. It is absolutely necessary to make this arrangement, for there is no power outside of Congress that can carry on the reporting and publishing of these debates. With this explanation I call the previous question on the joint resolution and amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to this joint resolution so as to provide for this printing to be done at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. LAFLIN. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. COVODE. I want to inquire if there is any evidence of reformation on the part of this man Crowell?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the call for the previous question.

The question was then taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 65, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was "Shall the main question now be put?"

Mr. WOOD. Upon this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 77, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clark, Clift, Corley, Cornell, Dawes, Deweese, Dixon, Eckley, Ela, Thomas D. Elliot, James T. Elliott, Forfiss, Ferry, Fields, Goss, Griswold, Hamilton, Heaton, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Ketcham, Koontz, Laflin, Loughbridge, Lynch, McCarthy, Moore, Morrell, Newcomb, Newsham, Peters, Plants, Price, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Trowbridge, Twickell, Uspon, Burt Van Horn, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dickey, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Gove, Gravelly, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Hixby, Holman, Hochkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, William Lawrence, Logan, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Nicklack, O'Neill, Orth, Poland, Prince, Raam, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Stevens, Stover, Tabor, Taylor, Thomas, Van Auker, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William Williams, Wood, and Woodward—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Ansell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barum, Birmingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Buckley, Cake, Callis, Cary, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Edwards, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Haughey, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, McCullough, Morrissey, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Polesy, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Young—75.

So the main question was not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The forty-five minutes allowed for the consideration of this joint resolution having expired, it goes again to the Speaker's table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 1963) granting a pension to Mary H. Gardner; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1971) granting a pension to Jacob S. Baker.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1928) granting a pension to Lemuel Bartholow;

A bill (H. R. No. 1930) granting a pension to Madge K. Guthrie and Robert B. Guthrie; and

A bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, late private in the eighteenth regiment of Indiana volunteers, in the war 1861.

The message further informed the House that the Senate still further insisted upon its amendments to House bill No. 1570, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and had agreed to the further conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. SUMNER, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and Mr. WHITE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 964) in regard to the pension of George A. Schreiner;

A bill (S. No. 965) for the relief Elizabeth Malthys;

A bill (S. No. 966) granting a pension to Anna E. Frei; and

A bill (S. No. 977) granting a pension to Mrs. Zelica T. Dunlap.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend by inserting on page 2, at the end of line twelve, the following:

Provided, That the act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Washington Gas Light Company," approved January 30, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I will state that this amendment does not come from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PETERS. I make the point of order that this amendment proposes independent legislation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this amendment is out of order; first, because it proposes independent legislation; and secondly, because it has not been considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now demand the previous question upon the bill and amendments. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am now entitled to an hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the House will allow me fifteen minutes, to be used in explaining amendments as the vote upon them progresses, I will relinquish the remainder of the time to which I am entitled.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] instead of the hour to which he is now entitled, fifteen minutes to be occupied in the explanation of amendments as they come before the House for action?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendments will be read in their order, and those upon which a vote is not demanded will be regarded as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The following amendment, on which a vote was demanded by Mr. HOLMAN, was read:

Insert on page 4 of the bill the following:
For the survey of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coast, $40,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. This is the amendment of which I gave an explanation in the Committee of the Whole and the one which was advocated before the Committee on Appropriations by Professor Pierce, now in charge of the Coast Survey. A larger sum was at first believed to be necessary, but those having charge of this work finally decided that they might possibly get along with this amount. The Committee on Appropriations unanimously agreed to recommend the appropriation. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the tenth amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as follows, a separate vote having been asked by Mr. BENJAMIN:

For refunding to the appropriation for the legislative expenses of Idaho Territory the amount advanced from this fund and not accounted for by the secretary of said Territory, $38,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should like to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill the meaning of that appropriation?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It is a deficiency which has been properly estimated for. The officer of the Government drew the money when properly appropriated, but he ran away to Europe, and has never been heard of since. It is necessary we should pay these officials. The money was taken off by one of the officers of the Government, and we must reappropriate it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Had we not better provide that the next one shall give security?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-first and a half amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union are for the continuation of certain public works, which were adopted this morning and last night. I ask that they be all voted on at once.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The amendments indicated were read, as follows:

Sixteenth amendment:

For the continuation of the work on the United States court-house and post office at Madison, Wisconsin, $25,000.

Seventeenth amendment:

For construction of a public building at Springfield, Illinois, for a court-house and post office and accommodation of offices of the United States, $25,000.

Eighteenth amendment:

For construction of appraisers' stores at Philadelphia, $37,500.

Nineteenth amendment:

For the construction of the public building at Cairo, Illinois, to be used as a post office, custom-house, and the United States court-room, $25,000.

Twentieth amendment:

For the construction of a custom-house at St. Paul, Minnesota, $25,000.

Twenty-first amendment:

For the construction of a custom-house at Ogdensburg, New York, $12,500.

Twenty-first and a half amendment:

For continuing the work on the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $35,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 60, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Banks, Beck, Blackburn, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckley, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cullom, Dickey, Donnelly, Eckley, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburt, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Newsham, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Plants, Poland, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Shanks, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Young—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boyden, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Cornell, Covode, Delano, Dewese, Dixon, Eggleston, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Loughridge, McCormick, Mercer, Moore, Mullins, Niblack, Roots, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Stevens, Stewart, Taylor, Upson, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Wood, and Woodward—60.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Brooks, Calkins, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Dawes, Dockery, Dodge, Driggs, Edwards, Elia, Eldridge, Farnsworth, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haughey, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Julian, Ketcham, Knott, Lash, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, Marvin, McCullough, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Pomerooy, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyok, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Woodbridge—86.

So the amendments were agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had, by a two-thirds vote, adopted the report of the committee of conference on Senate joint resolution No. 8, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

DEFICIENCY BILL—AGAIN.

The next amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. SCOFIELD, was read as follows:

For supplying deficiency in the compensation of register and receiver in the land office in Boise City, Idaho Territory, office rent and purchasing furniture, $6,324.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield to the Delegate from Idaho to make an explanation of this amendment, as it was adopted on his motion.

Mr. HOLBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I think I have afforded ample explanation when I state that these registers and receivers of land offices receive only $500 per annum, when clerks here who work only six hours out of the twelve ask to have their pay increased twenty per cent. when they now get from twelve to twenty-five hundred dollars a year. This also provides for furniture and office rent ordered three years ago by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

I can state to the House that this money was advanced by the register and receiver in the Territory over three years ago, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office asked for an appropriation to reimburse them for that expenditure. The Committee on the Public Lands reported a bill providing not only for the reimbursement of these officers but for an increase of their salary to at least the amount that our clerks in the Departments are paid. There was an amendment attached to the bill, however, and that amendment defeated it. The Committee on the Public Lands, as I am informed, have thoroughly considered the matter, and are unanimous in favor of the amendment in its present form. I trust no member of the House will vote against the refunding of the money to the register and receiver.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will ask the House to vote down the amendment, in the first place, because it is not a deficiency at all. The expenditure, if it ever occurred—and I suppose it did—was made without any authority of law, and it is therefore a claim upon the Government, perhaps a just one; I will not say how that is. Now, if the Delegate from Dakota had desired it should be put in any appropriation bill he should have brought it to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, and given them an opportunity to examine it carefully and see whether it was just and in accordance with law. They had authority to put it in any bill, and they might, if they found it right, have put it in the miscellaneous appropriation bill, which is now in Committee of the Whole. But they have made no examination of it and know nothing of its merits except what the gentleman who advocates it states about it. He says it was once rejected for reasons he gives. He says another committee have approved it. Of all that the Committee on Appropriations were ignorant. It was never brought to their attention in any way in the committee, though the gentleman may have spoken to some gentlemen on this floor about it. Therefore I ask the House to let the claim go to some proper committee for examination.

Mr. HOLBROOK. If the gentleman will allow me—I presume he does not intentionally misrepresent my statement—I have not said it was rejected by any committee. On the contrary I have stated that the Committee on the Public Lands examined it and have told me they agreed in all respects that the report was correct and that the money should have been refunded; and I would say to the gentleman that so far as calling the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to it was concerned it was a matter to which the attention of the House was called by the Commissioner of Public Lands, and it was referred by the House to the Committee on the Public Lands. That committee made a report a year ago and asked for its adoption.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to know if there is any requisition from the Interior Department for this appropriation.

Mr. HOLBROOK. A letter was read from the Commissioner of Public Lands to-day in the House stating that the parties had not received the payment they anticipated, and that there were claims in his department for the money which they advanced, and he asked the House to take action upon the matter.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Of course the gentleman does not suppose that I intentionally misrepresented him, and I do not think I misrepresented him at all. Now, he says the claim was defeated two years ago because there was some proviso attached to it. For some reason which he cannot explain that defeated it.

Mr. HOLBROOK. An amendment was put on about some deficiency in the South, from New Orleans, that no member seemed to know anything about.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Something which nobody knew anything about was attached to it by way of proviso, and it was defeated. All I have to say about it is it is a claim and not a deficiency, and we ought to run such things through the regular channel as far as we can. It is a claim only three years old to be sure, but still it is a claim that ought to go to some committee and that committee should be held responsible for it.

The question being put on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, there were—ayes 60, noes 52.

Mr. BENTON demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BENTON and HIGBY.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-two, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, on which a separate vote was demanded by Mr. SPALDING, was to strike out the following paragraph:

For a sufficient amount to pay the regular salary of the present minister resident at Portugal, and the exchange thereon, from July 1, 1866, so long as the same was withheld from him.

Mr. WARD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 68, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Bailey, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Dickey, Eckley, Elia, Ferriss, Fields, French, Gravely, Hamilton, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McKee, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Newsham, Orth, Plants, Price, Raum, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Starkweather, Stevens, Stokes, Stover, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, John T. Wilson, and Windom—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beck, Blair, Boyden, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cary, Churchill, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dewese, Dixon, Donnelly, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Hawkins, Heaton, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburt, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, McCarthy, McCormick, Miller, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Peters, Poland, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Scofield, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Twichell, Van Auker, Cadwalader C. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodward, and Young—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Calkins, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Cornell, Dockery, Dodge, Driggs, Edwards, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Haughey, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Knott, Lash, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marvin, McCullough, Mercer, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Pomerooy, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Stewart, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyok, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—87.

So the amendment was agreed to.

All the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having been disposed of the bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BURR demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LOUISIANA.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to question of privilege. I call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case from the second congressional district of Louisiana. Before making any statement of the case I desire to ask that the three claimants of the seat be allowed to address the House while the case is under consideration under the rules of the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I object.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. UPSON. I yield for a moment to the chairman of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state to the House that some days ago the House passed a resolution directing payment out of the contingent fund of the House of the sum of $2,500 to John D. Young. The Committee on Accounts find on examining the law that that resolution was not drawn in conformity to law and that it requires the sanction of the Committee on Accounts. I have therefore drawn another resolution in conformity with the requirements of the law, and in that resolution I have also inserted the name of John A. Wimpy, of Georgia. The Georgia case it is apprehended, in the present condition of the business of the House, cannot be decided upon its merits, as the House is awaiting the action of the Committee on Reconstruction, and it is impossible at the present period of the session to expect action on the report of the Committee of Elections. I therefore treat the case precisely as if it were finished, and ask the House to adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to the introduction of the resolution at this time and I call for the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I have myself no particular interest in this matter. But it does seem to me that it is but an act of justice to those parties who came here in good faith with their claims and prosecuted them according to law.

Mr. HIGBY. Was not this Mr. Young rejected by the House on account of being a rebel?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution to which he has referred.

Mr. DAWES. I will not move to suspend the rules because I have no personal interest in this matter.

CUBAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for reference only.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let it be read so that we may know what it is.

The joint resolution was read. It declares that the Congress and the people of the United States are not indifferent to the struggle for national independence and emancipation in the Island of Cuba, which has been so long delayed by the exercise of European monarchical power and the influence of African slavery, but which has now begun under auspices favorable to American interests and universal freedom.

No objection was made.

Accordingly the joint resolution (H. R. No. 467) in relation to the struggle now going on in the Island of Cuba was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to report upon this resolution at any time.

Objection was made by several members.

ORDNANCE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to submit a report from the joint select Committee on Ordnance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] has called for the regular order.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw that call for the purpose mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I renew the call for the regular order.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for the House now resumes the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections upon the contested-election cases from the second congressional district of Louisiana.

Mr. UPSON. This is a double case. One is a contest for the original seat held by Mr. Mann, who died after being admitted. The other is a contest in relation to the unexpired term, for which there are two claimants. I will first call up the original case of Jones vs. Mann; and I ask that Mr. Jones be allowed to address the House on the subject under the rules of the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to his speaking; but I have no objection to allowing him to print his remarks in the Globe.

Mr. UPSON. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Simon Jones, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Louisiana, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer a substitute for the resolution which has just been read?

Mr. UPSON. I will let the substitute be offered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I offer the following resolution as a substitute for the one reported from the committee:

Resolved, That Simon Jones is entitled to a seat on this floor as a member of the Fortieth Congress from the second congressional district of the State of Louisiana, and that he be now sworn in.

Mr. UPSON. I have permitted this amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] as I understand the contestant desires to be heard before the House. But I will state that the Committee of Elections were unanimous in their report against his claim. Were it not that the contestant desires to address the House on his claim, I should feel myself justified, in the present condition of the business of the House, in calling the previous question after making a brief statement of the case.

Unless it is desired by the House to proceed with this case this evening, I will let it go over until to-morrow. If it is the desire of the House to proceed with its consideration now, of course I must go on with my statement of the case.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will yield I will submit a motion that the House now adjourn.

Mr. UPSON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes sixty-seven, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BALDWIN: The petitions of C. F. Flint and 162 others, of A. H. Allen and 115 others, of J. L. Rice and 37 others, R. T. Buck and 21 others, and Emma Southwick and 13 others, of Starbridge, Mendon, Brookfield, Millbury, and Millville, Massachusetts, that the right of women to vote may be established everywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States.

By Mr. GRAVELY: A petition of citizens of Greene, Dade, and Newton counties, Missouri, praying a daily line of mails from Springfield, Missouri, to Fort Scott, Kansas.

By Mr. KELSEY: The petition of John Douglass and 38 others, inhabitants of Peoria, New York, for an amendment of the Constitution.

Also, the petition of James McNab and 27 others, inhabitants of the towns of York and Caledonia, New York, for an amendment of the Constitution.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: A petition from citizens of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, asking for a change in the Constitution of the United States so that God and His Son Jesus Christ may be more fully recognized as the ruler of the nation.

By Mr. MILLER: Three petitions of sundry persons, asking for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States by inserting therein that the people humbly acknowledge Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as the supreme authority in order to constitute a Christian government.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of William Tate and 22 others, citizens of Butler county, Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution as shall recognize Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GRIMES. I submit the following report from the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the naval appropriation bill:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 1, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 8, 9, 17, 18, 20, and 26, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out said amendment and insert in lieu the following words: "two million five hundred thousand."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twenty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: in line eleven of said amendment strike out the word "sixteen" and insert in lieu the word "fourteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: in line five of said amendment strike out the words "as authorized," and insert in lieu the following words, "and of any other act authorizing;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. GRIMES,

J. W. NYE,

T. A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. P. SPALDING,

CHARLES E. PHELPS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that I have any objection to the report of the conference committee. It is perfectly understood, I imagine, by all the Senate. It is merely an illustration of how bills from conference committees are passed in this body. I presume that members understand it. I do not profess to do so, and do not know anything about it. Of course I do not object.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator desires any information about it I think I am able to give it to him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I notice an item of $2,000,000 in it. I presume it is all correct.

Mr. GRIMES. There were very few disagreeing votes between the two Houses on this bill. The first one was in regard to the navy-yard at Charlestown, in Massachusetts. The House of Representatives allowed $100,000 to that navy-yard; and the Senate reduced it to $50,000 upon no particular reason that I know of except that other navy-yards were fixed at $50,000, and the Committee on Appropriations recommended the Senate to put that at the same sum. But after a conference with the admiral in charge of the Bureau of Docks and Yards it was discovered that this additional $50,000 was asked for specially to keep in repair the dry-dock at that yard; there being only two dry-docks in all the navy-yards of the United States, and this one was getting exceedingly out of repair. The Senate committee of conference agreed with the House of Representatives in restoring the sum to $100,000.

The next disagreeing vote was that in regard to preparing maps and charts for navigation purposes. The House recede from their proposition.

The next was in regard to the professors at the Naval Academy. The House recede from their amendment in regard to them.

The next was in regard to three aids at the Observatory. The Senate had amended that proposition. There had been four aids allowed to the Naval Academy. The Senate changed the habit of allowing those four aids and created three assistant astronomers. The House objected to that, and the proposition goes back to the condition it has been in for several years.

The next was in regard to an appropriation of $5,000 for observing the eclipse of the sun. The House agreed with the Senate that it is important to the country and to science that we should send some astronomers for that purpose.

The next was in regard to erecting a small building in which to mount the transit circle at the Naval Academy. The House agreed with the Senate in their proposition in that regard.

The next, the twentieth amendment, was in regard to the officer in charge of gunnery at the Washington navy-yard. Several years ago, when Admiral Dahlgren was a lieutenant, in consideration of his having invented a gun and taking no patent for it, he being at that time stationed at the Washington navy-yard in charge of gunnery experiments, Congress declared that the officer in charge of that business employed in that way should have the sea-pay of the grade next above him; and the officer who has been his successor has since been drawing that pay. The Senate proposed to repeal that law and to allow the officer in charge of gunnery experiments in the navy-yard at Washington to have the same pay as any other officer performing similar duty at any other yard; and the House agree to that proposition.

The next is in regard to the $2,500,000 which the Senator spoke about. The House reduced the estimates for keeping vessels afloat and ashore in repair, in fact for the support of naval vessels, from $3,780,000 to $2,000,000. The Senate raised it to $3,000,000, $780,000 less than the estimate. The committee of conference agreed to $2,500,000, $500,000 less than the Senate agreed to, and $500,000 more than the House agreed to. I hope that meets the approbation of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does; but I should have preferred to leave it at $2,000,000.

Mr. GRIMES. The next amendment was in regard to the clerk at the Naval Academy, who, under the law, was entitled to $1,200 a year, although there has been $1,600 appropriated for his salary for some years. We were obliged to compromise with the committee of conference on the part of the House and take $1,400.

The next amendment was in regard to the apprentices who were authorized by law to be appointed by the President of the United States to the Naval Academy. The House concurred with the Senate in their amendment in that regard.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How does that leave those apprentices?

Mr. GRIMES. It strikes them off.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

FOSTER AND TOWER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. NYE. As there seem to be no petitions and memorials I am charged with a very little bill here for the relief of Foster & Tower, which I desire to put on its passage.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to introduce some petitions and bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill indicated by him at this time.

Mr. POMEROY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made it goes over.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator give way for one minute. It will not take a minute to pass this bill. It is a matter that has been placed in my hands and I desire very much to get rid of it. It is merely to correct an error, and it will not take a moment to pass it.

Mr. POMEROY. If it will lead to no discussion I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. NYE. There will be none at all.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1960) for the relief of Foster & Tower. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to allow to Messrs. Foster & Tower, of New York, out of the appropriation for yards and docks, the sum of $2,251, for difference in cost of crucibles furnished by them to the navy-yard at New York under contract, in which the price of the crucibles was erroneously stated at five cents each.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up for consideration the resolution in regard to the pay of Senators from the reconstructed States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that motion—I do not wish to interfere with the Senator—I desire to make a report on a matter of public interest.

Mr. MORTON. I will give way for reports as soon as the resolution is taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the regular business ought to be gone through with in the ordinary way before taking up anything else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will wait until the Senator gets it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution with regard to the pay of Senators from the reconstructed States. Does any Senator object?

Mr. DAVIS. I shall object unless we are allowed to make reports.

Mr. MORTON. I shall give way to the morning business as soon as it is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I now give way to morning business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the New York Agricultural Society, in favor of abolishing the duty on animals imported from foreign countries for breeding purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ABBOTT presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of the reestablishment of the branch mint at Charlotte, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, residents of the Solomon valley, praying that a military post be established at Asher creek, in that valley, for their protection against the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for payment in coin, have directed me to report it back with two amendments. I desire to give notice that I shall call this bill up to-morrow at one o'clock and ask for a vote of the Senate upon it; and I shall antagonize it with anything that is pending at that time.

The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 878) to encourage the building of steamships in the United States, have directed me to report it back and ask to be discharged on the ground that we have no time to consider it, and we prefer to let it go over to the next session without any recommendation.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on the Library have had under consideration the petition of Alexander Gardner, praying Congress to purchase his collection of photograph incidents of the war. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this petition, it being of the same nature as the one presented a few days since by Mr. Brady, because there is not sufficient time for Congress to consider it.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. MORGAN. The same committee have had under consideration the petition of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, praying the passage of a law for the protection of copyrights for works of art; and for the same reason ask to be discharged from that petition.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. MORGAN, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the adoption of the phonetic system of spelling into general use in schools and general literature, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 707) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a break-water and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay and Lake Michigan in said State, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Margaret Riddle, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 975) for the benefit of Margaret Riddle, widow and executrix of George Read Riddle, deceased. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of William S. Chapman, praying an extension of his patent, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Junius Boyle, commodore United States Navy, praying to be restored on the active list, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print one thousand copies of the memorial of Miss Clara Barton, praying for the passage of an act for the purpose of remedying defects in the existing laws in relation to the payment of bounties, back pay, and pensions, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage without amendment. Although it is not customary to print memorials, I do this partly at the request of my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] and partly as a just compliment to a lady who has rendered distinguished services to the Union cause both during the war and since the war, and who in her treatment of the sick, the dying, and the bereaved has united to the tenderness of her own sex the vigor and energy of ours. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORTON. There is a matter before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is simply a motion to print a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 930) authorizing certain land-grant railroad companies in the State of Minnesota to connect their lines with the Northern Pacific railroad, reported with it amendments.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following memorials, petitions, letters, and resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a United States land office in the valley of the Red River of the North;

A petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying the establishment of a land office at West Point, in that State;

A petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying that the lands along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad may be restored to market subject to the homestead and preemption laws, that a homestead may embrace one hundred and sixty acres, and that the land may be entered at $1 25 per acre;

A joint resolution and memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, praying the establishment of a land office at Lone Tree, Nebraska;

A petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying the establishment of a land office at Beatrice, in that State;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an extension of the time for the completion of the military road from Fort Wilkins, Michigan, to Fort Howard, Wisconsin;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin River Valley railroad;

A memorial of the General Assembly of Iowa, in relation to the project of connecting by navigable channels through the Fox and Wisconsin rivers the waters of the Mississippi river with the waters of Lake Michigan;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the removal of the restrictions on the further entry of public lands with agricultural college scrip in the State of Wisconsin;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the confirmation of title to the unsurveyed islands in the Wisconsin river;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the Minnesota and the Missouri River railroad from Minnesota to Yankton, in Dakota Territory;

A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a ship-canal from Sturgeon bay to Lake Michigan;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a grant of lands for the purpose of building a wagon-road from Chippewa Falls to Ashland, in that State;

A memorial of the mayor and council of Green Bay, Wisconsin, praying a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a ship-canal from Sturgeon bay to Lake Michigan;

A memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, remonstrating against any further extension of the time for the completion of the railroad from Lake St. Croix to Lake Superior unless the company shall build, equip, and put in complete running order forty miles of road before making application for such extension;

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the request of the parties I ask leave to withdraw the petition and papers of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society of Indiana, with a view that they may be referred to the commission which is examining into such claims in the State of Indiana.

Leave was granted.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Colonel William Gates, praying remuneration for losses by the wreck of the steamer San Francisco, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 976) for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the United States Army who sustained loss by the disasters to the steamships Winfield

Scott and San Francisco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 239) more efficiently to protect the fur seals in Alaska; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I ask the Senate to take action on the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution properly before the Senate. It can only be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That the islands of St. Paul and St. George, in Alaska, be, and they are hereby, declared a special reservation for Government purposes, and that, until otherwise provided by law, it shall be unlawful for any person not an officer of the United States to land or remain on either of said islands except by the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury; and any such person found on either of said islands contrary to the provisions of this act shall be summarily removed. But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize a removal of the bona fide inhabitants of said islands permanently resident thereon at the date of the treaty of cession, nor in any way to relate to or affect them or their property, or any rights belonging to them under the said treaty; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to carry this act immediately into effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at this time.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I wish the gentleman would not object. If he will allow me a moment to state—

Mr. GRIMES. I will hear you.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Argument cannot be allowed until it is known whether the Senate will consent to take up the joint resolution.

Mr. MORTON. I cannot yield to my friend.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Let it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 240) for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHTING OF THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. NYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing the old carrier tubes over the Hall of the Senate to be removed and new pipes to be placed where required with electric gas burners with lava tips, to be lighted by electricity from the battery now used for lighting the Dome, Rotunda, and Hall of Representatives; Provided, The whole expense shall not exceed the sum of $6,300, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

KEELER MAPS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of publishing a limited number of the Keeler maps of the Territories, mineral and Indian reservation, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior,

Mr. POMEROY. While the Committee on Printing are considering the expediency of publishing the Keeler map, I wish to remark that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has a map, which we have tried to get published, which is much better than the Keeler map so far as it relates to the public lands. The Committee on Public Lands reported in favor of its being published, but the Committee on Printing reported against it on account of the expense.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing are prepared to report that at any time the gentlemen in favor of the publication wish it to be done. We have held it back because the committee felt bound—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been agreed to, and it cannot admit of argument after it has been decided.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPherson monument.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors and assessors.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 467) to confirm an entry of land by Moses F. Shinn;

A bill (H. R. No. 284) for the relief of N. A. Shuttleworth, of Harrison county, West Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1128) for the relief of Isaac Watts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1867) for the relief of George Kaiser;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 265) for the relief of Edward E. Shead, of Eastport, State of Maine;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 460) in relation to the meeting of the House of Representatives at the first session of the Forty-First Congress; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1966) for the relief of Foster and Tower.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPherson monument was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

Mr. MORTON. I believe the resolution in regard to the pay of Senators from the reconstructed States is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

Mr. MORTON. It has been read.

Mr. FERRY. Let it be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] to insert the words "second session of the" before the words "Fortieth Congress."

Mr. MORTON. I was about to move that amendment, not knowing it had been moved already. I hope a vote will be taken on the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw the amendment. I believe it has not been agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I renew the amendment. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is still on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdrew the amendment because, on reflection, finding that these Senators had been paid for the time of their service, I could not but regard it as a gratuity to pay them anything more. If we are to set an example in the case of ourselves why not set the same example in relation to military and naval officers and pay them for a year and a half before their term commences? Take, as an illustration of this case—some of these Senators, as I understand, were employed by the Government and receiving a salary up to the time of their election, paid by the Government. Now we propose to double up and pay them for the time they have been paid while they were employed by the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to inquire of the Senator, if he has examined this subject, how much time this resolution as amended proposes to pay the Senators prior to the passage of the bill recognizing the States as entitled to representation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. For the entire session.

Mr. FERRY. Seven months.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My colleague perhaps knows whether we did not pass a resolution on this subject at the last session. If we did I should like to know what it was. I think this matter was regulated at the last session.

Mr. WHYTE. This very question was determined at the last session. The other day when it came up I asked the President whether it had not been so determined. From my memory at that time I was sure that it had been. I find by reference to the Congressional Globe that the subject was discussed on an amendment offered to the same resolution by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] and finally determined in the Senate on the 25th of July. On that day, as will be seen on page 4464 of the Congressional Globe for the last session of Congress, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] offered a resolution which I believe is in the same language as the one now proposed; it was in these words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the States of Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress."

To that resolution the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] offered an amendment striking out all after the word "Arkansas," in the third line, and inserting:

"The compensation allowed by law from the 22d day of June, 1868, and to the Senators from Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana, from the 25th day of June, 1868, and to the Senators from South Carolina from the — day of —, 1868."

On page 4455, this amendment having been stated, the following proceedings occurred:

"Mr. DRAKE. The Senators from South Carolina should be included with the Senators from Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana. They came in under the omnibus bill.

"Mr. DAVIS. That is my understanding.

"Mr. DRAKE. Just put in South Carolina with the others of the same date.

"Mr. DAVIS. The Clerk can make that modification."

The modification was made, and on page 4462, this amendment having been agreed to, and the question being on the resolution as amended, it appears that—

"The resolution, as amended, was agreed to."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I understand that a few moments since, when I was absent from the Chamber, some reference was made by the honorable Senator from Vermont to the fact that some Senators from the southern States who would be benefited under this resolution in case it passed were holding Federal offices during part of the time covered by the resolution. I think it due to myself to state—I should not state it otherwise—that I have never had any intention of availing myself of any benefit under this resolution in case it shall pass. I held a Federal office a portion of the time, in fact up to the day I was sworn in as Senator. The resolution would not benefit me at all. I mention this partially in justice to myself and to relieve the case from some embarrassment perhaps.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask one more question, whether any rule has been adopted in the House of Representatives on this subject?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio how that is? I think he stated at the last session that he had investigated it. I think he stated that the allowance went back to the first of the Congress, and including the Senators and Representatives it would amount to nearly half a million dollars.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I was not here at the time this action was had at the last session; but I am advised that some of the Senators from the reconstructed States were assured by a number of Senators on the floor that there was no time then to settle the disputed question, and that that resolution should not be regarded as a settlement at all.

The precedents in the Senate that have been referred to would authorize these Senators to receive pay from the beginning of the Congress. The amendment now is that they receive pay from the beginning of the last session. I had supposed there would be no particular objection to that. If the precedents of the Senate amount to anything at all they should be somewhat uniform in their application; and there is no good reason for making fish of one and flesh of another. I know of no reason for a discrimination against the Senators from the reconstructed States in the application of a rule to them that has not been applied to others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing, as a compromise, to vote for the proposition now made by the Senator from Indiana; that is, to give these Senators and members pay from the beginning of the session at which they took their seats. I do not see the force of the precedents quite so strongly as my friend from Indiana. The case of Tennessee, which is the only one that is really applicable, was under peculiar circumstances; it did not extend so far as this, and probably was not very carefully considered. I think it is right to give these Senators and members pay from the beginning of the session in which they participated. Many of them were actually engaged in their States in the work of reconstruction before they had a right to come here. The precedents allow members and Senators their pay from the beginning of the term in most cases. In some States members are not elected until after the term commences, as in Kentucky; where they are elected in August for the term beginning the preceding March, and they get the pay from the beginning of the term. I am willing for one to vote, as a compromise, for the proposition now made to commence this pay on the first Monday of December, 1867. If you go back to the 4th of March of that year it would make an addition to the compensation of each Senator and member from these States of about six thousand five hundred dollars, and if there are one hundred of them—there are probably not quite so many—it would make over six hundred thousand dollars; but if you commence it in December it does not give them much more than they are already entitled to. They get no additional mileage, because they have but one mileage for the session, and the result is simply to go back a few months before the time of their election. Probably, under the circumstances, that would be as just and fair an arrangement as could be made. I am therefore willing to vote to commence their pay from the first Monday of December, 1867. The resolution which we passed at the last session began their pay some time in June. This makes a difference of about six months' pay. I think that is fair.

Mr. FERRY. As I feel myself constrained to vote against any change in the rule established by the Senate last summer in reference to this compensation I wish to state very briefly the reasons which influenced me. As I understand it both Houses at the last session adopted a rule of compensation to the new members from the reconstructed States which fixes the date of the admission of their respective States as the date of the commencement of compensation. In my judgment that rule is right. In my judgment to go back of the date of the admission of their respective States is to draw money from the Federal Treasury to be expended as a mere gratuity. If we set the precedent in the Senate it will be followed undoubtedly in the other House, and an expense of $100,000 will thus be imposed on the Treasury which, in my judgment, ought not to be imposed, and which there is certainly no law for the imposition of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is no new matter in the Senate of the United States, but is a question that arose soon after the passage of the law of 1856. It arose then in regard to certain Senators who came to this body and who were elected after the Congress commenced. The cases of Messrs. Nourse, of Maine, Gwin, of California, Green, of Missouri, Fitch, of Indiana, and Bigler, of Pennsylvania, were all involved in the construction of the law of 1856 at that time. The Senate referred the matter at that time to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on the Judiciary examined the law and gave a construction to it in a somewhat elaborate report which was made in March, 1857. I shall only read a few sentences of it to show the construction which was put upon the law by that committee at that time; and it was sanctioned by the Senate, according to my recollection. I have sent for the Journal, and I have no doubt it will be so found:

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the following statement, submitted to the Senate by the President pro tempore, report:

"The President of the Senate pro tempore states to the Senate that questions have arisen before him on the construction of the act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress, approved 16th August, 1856, which affect the compensation of certain Senators who have been chosen since the commencement of the first and of the present session of this Congress, respectively, as to the time when the compensation of each should commence, and of the mileage properly to be allowed, which the President pro tempore desires should be submitted to the Senate.

"The first section of the compensation act of the 16th of August, 1856, provides 'that the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $8,000 for each Congress, and mileage, as now provided by law, for two sessions only, to be paid in manner following, to wit: on the first day of each regular session each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage for one session; and on the first day of each month thereafter, during such session, compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum during the continuance of such session; and at the end of such session he shall receive the residue of his salary due to him at such time, at the rate aforesaid still unpaid; and at the beginning of the second regular session of the Congress each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall receive his mileage for such second session, and monthly during such session compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum till the 4th day of March, terminating the Congress, and on that day each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be entitled to receive any balance of the $8,000 not heretofore paid in the said monthly installments as above directed.'

The committee go on to examine the law. That act fixed $3,000 as the annual compensation, which was afterwards changed to $5,000, without changing the law in other respects. The committee conclude:

"Testing the cases submitted to us by those principles we find the rule of compensation, in all cases of election after the first day of the first regular session, to be that the compensation does not commence until after election, and from thence to the end of the term, at the rate of $3,000 per annum. This rule, in the opinion of your committee, applies to the cases of Messrs. Nourse, Gwin, Green, and Fitch. The case of Mr. Bigler is somewhat different. He was elected after the time fixed by law for the commencement of the first regular session of this Congress, but before the organization of the two Houses, and was in his seat the day the Congress entered upon its legislative duties; therefore, if not within the strict letter of the law, he is certainly within its equity, and your committee therefore recommend that he be paid for the whole Congress, deducting all the days he was absent except for the time excused by the law.

"We also consider that the question of mileage is settled by the same rule of construction."

The "rule of construction" is thus stated in another part of the report:

"He who serves the whole of each session of Congress is entitled to the whole $6,000; he who is legally entitled to serve during the whole of each session, and is prevented by the sickness of himself or family from doing so, is also entitled to the whole $6,000, and none others. But these two classes are entitled to the whole compensation under this act. None of the cases submitted to us come within either of these classes, and are therefore excluded. In case of the death of a member after the beginning of the first session his personal representative is entitled to receive all the compensation not received by him which has accrued at the time of death, computed at the rate of $3,000 per annum, and his successor could in no event be entitled to more than the residue of the $6,000 not paid to the deceased member or his personal representative. None of the cases submitted belong to this class, but it furnishes a rule of construction which your committee believe will truly discover the intent of the act. There is nothing in the act itself which would warrant the application of a different rule of compensation to a member who fills a vacancy happening in any other manner different from one happening on the death of a sitting member after the commencement of a session; nor are we able outside of the act to discover any sound reason for such different construction. Though the mode of payment is by annual salary the consideration therefor in the contemplation of the act was the performance of the duties of a member of Congress when in actual session, and the times of payment seem to have been fixed during or at the end of each session with special reference to securing this consideration."

The committee there come to the conclusion that the Senators were only entitled to pay from the time that they were competent to serve, that is from the time of their election, except in a case where a Senator was elected for a full term and not elected until after the 4th of March, when the term began, as members in the House of Representatives in some States now are not elected until August. Congress at that time did not convene until December, and the committee came to the conclusion that in such cases the men who were elected for the whole term and who served during the whole time that Congress was in session were entitled to pay for the whole Congress, but a person who was elected afterward was only entitled to pay from the time of his election.

In the case of Minnesota, which was a new State admitted into the Union, the question arose again in 1858, and was again submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and this very succinct report was made by Mr. BAYARD, then chairman of that committee:

"Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Senate in relation to the compensation of the Senators from Minnesota, reported:

"That there is no express provision in the act regulating the compensation of Senators and members of Congress applicable to the particular case presented, but, in the opinion of the committee, a correct construction of the act of August 16, 1856, forbids the allowance of compensation until the State of Minnesota was admitted into the Union, and that the compensation to the Senators from that State should commence on the day of the admission, May 11, 1858."

These Senators had been elected before that. These States now under consideration are like Minnesota in one respect. They were not entitled to representation in this body until Congress so declared. The State of Minnesota, which had organized a State government in pursuance of what was called an enabling act of Congress, was not admitted until May 11, 1858, and the question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to determine when the pay of the Minnesota Senators should commence, and it was decided that it should commence at the time the State was admitted into the Union. In precise harmony with that this body decided at its last session "that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Arkansas the compensation allowed by law from the 22d day of June, 1863, and to the Senators from Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Louisiana, from the 25th day of June, 1863," which were the dates respectively of the passage of the acts of Congress admitting those States to representation in this body. That was in strict conformity to the decision of the Senate ten years ago. It had always been the practice until the Tennessee Senators came here, and then the Senate departed from the settled practice of this Government always before. This list of precedents that has been presented here is not correct, as will be seen by reference to the Journals in regard to the action that has taken place in regard to the admission of Senators from new States.

When the question of the pay of the Tennessee Senators was submitted there was some controversy about it, and the Senate allowed them pay from the commencement of the Congress; and it was because the Senate had done that that I introduced a resolution at a former session of this Congress to pay these Senators in the same way, supposing that the Senate had in the Tennessee case reversed its former decision; which in my judgment was the correct and proper one, and had always been adhered to; but when the matter came to be considered in this body the Senate refused to follow the precedent in the Tennessee case, and went back to the precedents adopted in 1857 and 1858 in regard to the construction of this law, which in my judgment is the true construction.

Now, having done that, I supposed, and so the Committee on the Judiciary supposed, that this matter was ended; and when this resolution was referred to the committee at the present session they looked to the action of the Senate at the last session of Congress; they looked to the construction which had been placed upon this law for ten years, and, supposing the thing was ended, under the direction of the committee I reported this resolution back to the Senate adversely. That was the report of the Judiciary Committee. I had hoped that that would be the end of it. I think that we had better adhere to the construction, which was placed upon this law ten years ago, and which, in my judgment, is the correct construction and which this Senate placed upon it at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall say but a word in reply to the honorable Senator from Illinois. It is manifest that the case of Minnesota is not like the one before us. Minnesota was not a State in the Union at all until she was admitted; but these States were States in the Union, though they were not entitled to representation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the difference?

Mr. SHERMAN. The distinction has so often been made by the learned chairman of the Judiciary Committee that I do not think I need reply to that question. They were States in the Union, as he has stated very often, but on account of the civil war they were not entitled to representation, because an adverse authority to the Government of the United States had overthrown civil government there temporarily; and until those States were restored to their right of representation by Congress, although they were States in the Union, they were not entitled to representation. I think the distinction is very obvious.

In this matter there ought to be a uniform rule fixing the time at which the pay of the members and Senators from the southern States shall commence. I have felt this difficulty. The members of the other House now receive their pay from various dates, depending upon the time of their election, according to the rule adopted there. For instance, the members from Alabama get their pay from February 4, 1868, because that was the date at which they were elected, although when they were elected they were not entitled to be admitted, because until the action of the convention was submitted to Congress and acted upon by Congress the members-elect from Alabama had no right to seats. The House of Representatives violated our rule by going back and giving them pay from the time of their election, although they were not entitled to take their seats until some time in June, while Senators under our rule from the same States, admitted at the same time, were not entitled to their pay until June. That is manifestly improper and inequitable. So it is in all the other cases. The House of Representatives undertook to establish a rule which allowed the members pay from the time of their election; but they were not entitled to come here at the time of their election by the reconstruction acts.

The result is that there is a diverse rule applying to every State. In the other House the members are paid from the date of their election; but that rule is not applied in the Senate, and the Senators are paid from the date of the admission of their States to representation. Under these circumstances, it struck me, when the honorable Senator from Indiana modified his resolution so as to give them pay back to the first Monday of December, that it was a fair compromise that we could all agree upon. This will not add very largely to the amount. There are twelve Senators to whom the resolution applies, and they will get on an average about six months' pay beyond that allowed by the resolution of the last session. In the House each member from these States will get much less, because those members have already been paid from the time of their election; and, as we all know, the election of members occurred several months before the election of Senators. In North Carolina the election of the members was on the 2d of April; in South Carolina on the 14th of April; in Louisiana on the 18th of April, from which time the members have drawn their pay; so that those members, if the House should adopt the rule now proposed here, would get only three or four months' additional pay, which is not a very great matter when we consider that they were engaged in the work of reconstruction preliminary to their election, as much so, at least, as members who ran in Kentucky, elected in August, are entitled to pay back to the 4th of March. It seems to me we ought to put the Senators and members on the same footing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How does the Senator make it out that they only get three months' more pay? They are now paid from the 25th of June, as I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say the Senators will get more, but the members of the House will only get three or four months' more pay under this resolution, if it applies to them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know what the other House may do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the matter is not yet finally settled in the House of Representatives. The question, I am told, is still depending there. There ought to be a rule of uniform application to the members and Senators. They ought to draw their pay from a given time; and when the proposition was modified to make it commence from the first Monday of December, 1867, which removes all objection growing out of any possible claim for additional mileage and pay for nine months before the session began, it seems to me to be a reasonable and fair proposition, which we can properly accept. If the rule be made applicable to both Houses they will receive full pay for the session during which they served—the second session of this Congress. I shall vote for that, thinking it is a fair and liberal adjustment to those gentlemen, and at the same time fair to the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to say one word in reference to the point which the Senator from Ohio makes that the case of Minnesota is not analogous. He says these were States and Minnesota was not a State. The question is here whether persons representing these States were entitled to compensation. The State of South Carolina was a State without a State government, and, of course, if there was no State government to be represented there could be no Senators entitled to compensation any more from South Carolina than from Minnesota. But I beg to inform the Senator from Ohio that Minnesota had formed her State government. Her case was a stronger one than this. She had elected her Senators to this body before the passage of the act here declaring Minnesota a State in the Union. An enabling act had been passed for the benefit of Minnesota and she had formed a State constitution and State government, had elected her Senators, sent them here, and they were here in waiting urging the admission of their State; and the Senate solemnly, after investigation, came to the conclusion that the Senators were only entitled to compensation when there was a government behind them that was entitled to representation. That is precisely similar to the case here. The Senators from these States are entitled to compensation when there was a State government behind them to entitle them to representation; and certainly upon no other principle can they be entitled to it before. And then, let me ask the Senator from Ohio, how does he get over the positive provision of the statute? These Senators performed no service, for they were not in the Senate until after the 25th of June, 1868. He proposes to pay them from the first Monday in December, 1867. Now, can they make the certificate? He and I could not receive pay if he and I had been absent from the first Monday in December, 1867, to the 25th of June, 1868, unless by reason of sickness. We must upon honor state the days of our absence and a deduction is made from our pay. How can these Senators receive pay when they were not in attendance; how can they make the certificate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am fully committed on this question. When the resolution was passed in reference to the State of Tennessee I resisted it to the best of my feeble ability. I knew then, or supposed I knew, that it was a departure from the precedents and that it would establish a practice that would lead to mischievous results. I then spoke once or twice on the question and exhibited the reasons for opposing that resolution, and my views have not been changed upon the subject at all. It seems to me that after the Senate has once passed upon the question the motion to renew this controversy as to the pay of these Senators ought not to be sanctioned by the Senate; but as the chairman of the Finance Committee seems to have abandoned the ground heretofore taken on the subject I do not know that other members of the Senate ought to struggle against a claim of this kind. We have been accustomed to look to the chairman of the Committee on Finance to protect the Treasury of the Government against claims of this description, but in this case he seems to take a different view, and it is very probable that his opinions on the subject may have sufficient weight to carry through this resolution; but my opinion is unchanged, and I do not see how with any propriety the claim can be made that before these States were entitled to any representation in Congress, when there was no possibility of their having any Senators here, we should propose to pay Senators for services prior to that date. I cannot reconcile it with any view of the law or any principle or any reason that ought to influence a question of this kind.

Mr. STEWART. I must call for the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senate will dispose of this matter. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is the report of the committee of conference on the constitutional amendment.

Mr. MORTON. This resolution has been up two or three times and has been jammed off. I think it is due to the Senate that it should be now settled. I hope, therefore, the regular order will be passed over informally for that purpose.

Mr. STEWART. If the discussion is ended I have no objection; but otherwise I cannot agree to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot say that the discussion is ended.

Mr. STEWART. Then I insist on the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I move to postpone the regular order, say for half an hour. I think this matter will not take half that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the special order be postponed for half an hour.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. FERRY. Will that displace the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is the understanding that it shall not displace the regular order the Chair will endeavor to enforce the understanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot have any understanding.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Chair what is the effect of the motion under the rule? Does it displace the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is of course displaced when another matter is taken up by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. Then I hope the motion to postpone will not prevail.

Mr. MORTON. I will consent to let this matter go over until the constitutional amendment is disposed of with the understanding that it shall then be called up and disposed of.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A special order is before the Senate, being the report of the committee of conference on joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their amendments and agree to the resolution of the Senate, with an amendment, as follows:

In section one, line two, strike out the words "or hold office;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

W. M. STEWART,
ROSCOE CONKLING,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGES BOUTWELL,
JOHN A. BINGHAM,
JOHN A. LOGAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the reading of the joint resolution as it will read if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) that the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XV.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress by appropriate legislation may enforce the provisions of this article.

Mr. POMEROY. I am embarrassed a little in regard to this question by the manner in which the committee have made the report. The resolution called joint resolution No. 8 was passed by the Senate by a constitutional vote of two thirds, restraining the United States or any State from restricting the right to vote and hold office on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery. That resolution, as is known to all the Senators, passed and went to the House. The House amended it by inserting three words; they amended it by restraining the States from putting any restrictions relating to nativity, property, and education. It came back then to the Senate, and the Senate disagreed to the amendment, and asked for a committee of conference. The conference was agreed to by the two Houses, and then the committee of conference took up the question. The committee of conference then have reported to us that the House recede from their amendment, and without stopping there they have ventured to tamper with the text of the resolution which had been agreed to by the two Houses. That, I undertake to say, is both unparliamentary and almost unprecedented. We have had a somewhat rich experience in this Senate upon the question of the power of a committee of conference to change what had been agreed to by the two Houses, and it has never yet passed the Senate when the question has been made, excepting, as we have it recorded in the books, that after that fact was distinctly stated it passed unanimously and it was agreed to unanimously on account of its having been a violation of parliamentary law and of the powers of a committee of conference. That has been the result in all the cases I have been able to find.

We had a very lengthy discussion on this question when a committee of conference several years ago made a report here on the bill providing that executive officers should not be held accountable in civil process for arrests. The committee of conference changed the text of the bill somewhat more in form than in words. It was discussed here all day and all night, and at three o'clock in the morning the bill finally passed this body. The discussion was not made on the ground that the committee of conference could not change the text of the bill which had been agreed to by the two Houses, but the contest was over the merits of the case on the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. I will not occupy the time of the Senate with that case. It occupies a great deal of space in the Globe. I have had occasion to read through it. I will only refer to a few cases that have occurred recently within our own recollection, so that Senators will be sure I am right. I have seen also several cases that occurred in the earlier history of the proceedings in the Senate.

The first case that struck my attention after I became a member of the Senate was the report of a committee of conference which was made by the then Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Clark, upon House bill No. 780, to protect the revenue, and for other purposes. The committee reported that they had met; and after full and free conference had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses that the House recede from certain amendments, and then that the Senate recede from other amendments, and finally they inserted this new proviso:

"Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall apply to long combing or carpet wools costing twelve cents or less per pound unless the charges so added shall carry the cost above twelve cents per pound, in which case one cent per pound shall be added."

That was entirely new matter, not in either of the bills that had passed the two Houses. I find the action of the Senate on that report thus recorded in the Journal:

"The Senate proceeded to consider the report and the accompanying recommendation of the committee of conference in respect to an amendment to the text of the bill.

"On motion by Mr. CLARK,
Resolved, That the Senate agree to the said report, and that it unanimously agree to the amendment to the text of the bill as recommended by the committee of conference.

"Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof."

It was held in that case that it required the unanimous consent of the Senate to amend the text of the bill. It was so reported and so argued.

Mr. CONKLING. It does not appear so, from what you have read, but that the Senate unanimously agreed to it.

Mr. POMEROY. It was so held in the debate, as appears in the Globe. The report of the committee contained nothing about that; but when the Senate came to act upon it it took this action:

"The Senate proceeded to consider the report and the accompanying recommendation of the committee of conference in respect to an amendment to the text of the bill.

"On motion by Mr. CLARK,
Resolved, That the Senate agree to the said report, and that it unanimously agree to the amendment to the text of the bill as recommended by the committee of conference."

It was held that that was the only way in which the text of the bill could be changed.

Mr. CONKLING. You mean in the arguments?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; and that was the action of the Senate. It was argued so, as appears by the Globe.

There are one or two other cases. They are all to the same import in effect. Here is a case where a committee of conference reported on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the 16th of June, 1862, on an amendment to House bill No. 413, making appropriations for the payment of the bounty authorized by the sixth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting the public property," approved July 22, 1861.

They reported a change of the text of the bill:

"The report having been read, the Vice President—

Mr. Hamlin, of Maine, was then in the chair—

"stated that he thought it the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee of conference in their report had recommended a change in the text of the bill.

"The Senate proceeded to consider the report; and, on motion by Mr. POWELL, that the Senate disagree to the report, and that it be recommitted to the committee of conference," &c.

When the Presiding Officer, who was then Vice President of the United States, on that occasion felt it his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee of conference had undertaken to amend the text of the bill which had been agreed to by the two Houses, the Senate at once recommitted the report; and if you will read the debate on that occasion you will see that it was held in the argument that the power of a committee of conference was confined to disagreeing votes between the two Houses; that a conference was asked on that account; and that when they had reconciled the votes of the two Houses, their mission had ended, and they could only report to their respective Houses what they had accomplished toward reconciling the disagreeing votes; that it was not in their power to amend the text.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to make an inquiry of the Senator. Is not the case which he has just handed me, and are not all the cases on this head, instances of a committee of conference putting some matter into a bill upon which the two Houses had not acted one way or the other, introducing new and original matter?

Mr. POMEROY. Some of these cases do involve that with this other principle.

Mr. CONKLING. Do they not all involve it?

Mr. POMEROY. They all involve that; but they all involve this also: that they undertook to change the text of the bill which had been agreed to between the two Houses; and since I have been a member of this body I never have seen the original text of a bill changed by a committee of conference that it was not resisted when it came into the Senate; but we have cured it by agreeing to it unanimously. In this case it will be observed that the Presiding Officer arrested the report of the committee by announcing that they had undertaken to change the text of the bill, and the Senate at once recommitted it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What case was that?

Mr. POMEROY. That was a case upon the report of the committee of conference on the 16th of June, 1862, on House bill No. 413, making appropriations for the payment of bounties authorized by the sixth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers," &c.

After it had been recommitted we find that—

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 413) making appropriations for the payment of the bounty, &c., and Mr. POWELL having modified his motion to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the report of the committee of conference, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said bill."

That resolution was carried—yeas 20, nays 17. As soon as the committee of conference changed the text of the bill in that case the Senate first recommitted it to the committee, and when they made their second report it was disagreed to, and a new committee of conference was asked for and given.

I do not desire to consume time on this subject. This question of a constitutional amendment has been before the Senate for a long time. I have no hostility to the measure itself, but I have insisted year after year that the Senate owes it to itself to maintain its parliamentary law and parliamentary practice. It is laid down in Jefferson's Manual—and nothing can be laid down clearer—that a committee of conference cannot change what has been agreed upon by the two Houses, but their power terminates when they have undertaken to reconcile the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. The House of Representatives have made Jefferson's Manual a part of their rules. Where it does not conflict with their own rules they have adopted Jefferson's Manual, and if the House of Representatives have adopted this report they have broken their own rule on this question.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator mean to say that the committee have attempted to revise any portion of the text of the bill which stands as independent matter and not dependent upon the amendment? I am very confident that they have not.

Mr. POMEROY. There were two distinct propositions agreed upon between the two Houses. One was that the colored man should have the right to vote; another was that he should have the right to hold office. The two Houses agreed to the proposition that he should have the right to vote and the right to hold office; and the committee of conference have stricken out one clause—the right to hold office.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is mistaken. The proposition agreed to by the Senate was that the colored man should have the right to vote and to hold office. The House said, "Very well; he shall have that right provided you will attach other conditions," which qualified the right to vote and to hold office.

Mr. POMEROY. I was only going to add, not desiring to take up time or to express myself as hostile to the measure, that I think committees of conference should be held strictly to parliamentary law and good usage; and where a distinct proposition has been agreed to by both Houses it should not again come into the discussion by a recommendation of a committee of conference to change it. What the Senator from Nevada says is true in one respect. The House did agree to this proposition with an amendment. When the House concluded to recede from its amendment the disagreement ceased; there was no further conflict between the two Houses. This proposition to hold office has always been as distinct a proposition as any other proposition in the constitutional amendment, and it was not in the power of the committee of conference to change it. That is the usage of the Senate and the parliamentary law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to raise a question of order?

Mr. POMEROY. It is not a question of order. I will raise it if it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it, then?

Mr. POMEROY. In previous debates Senators undertook to raise the question of order. It was tried two or three times, and the Chair always held that it was not a question of order.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say but a word on this question. The Senator from Kansas is entirely mistaken about the point.

Mr. POMEROY. It is possible that I am, and it is possible that I am not.

Mr. STEWART. It is not true, in point of fact, that this was an entire proposition. Let me state it to the Senate. The Senate passed a resolution to insert in the Constitution these words:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and to hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The House amended that proposition so that it would read thus:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and to hold office shall not be denied or abridged by any State—leaving out "the United States"— on account of race, color, nativity, property, creed, or previous condition of servitude; qualifying the right to hold office, as contained in the Senate proposition, by two other conditions, or stating cases in which the States should not deny the right to hold office by putting in two other propositions; qualifying the proposition of the Senate that they should have the right to hold office by a very important amendment. They did not agree in the qualification upon the right to hold office. The right to hold office was a dependent proposition qualified by three additional restrictions. It is not an independent proposition, it is all one sentence; and the reason of the thing, it seems to me, is that where a sentence is an entirety and one part is made dependent upon another, it is impossible for a committee of conference to compare views and comply with the general principle of a free conference, as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, unless they can so modify the sentence as to make it a complete whole and accommodate the difference between the two Houses. This is what Jefferson's Manual says:

"At free conferences the managers discuss, vis à vis and freely, and interchange propositions for such modifications as may be made in a parliamentary way and may bring the sense of the two Houses together."

Mr. BAYARD obtained the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me a moment I desire to read another case which belongs to the cases that I cited. This case is within the memory of almost every Senator, because it occurred in 1867. It was on the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 234, to incorporate the National Capital Insurance Company. The Senate will remember that that extraordinary bill, the only national corporation that ever got through this body, and if we had it before the body now I fancy it never would go through, was finally compromised by a committee of conference. The committee made their report, in which they undertook to reconcile the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and then they changed the text of the bill, and here is the action of the Senate upon it:

"The Senate proceeded to consider the report; and

"On motion by Mr. MORRILL"—

The Senator from Maine, who was chairman of the committee—

"Resolved, That the Senate agree thereto.

"The Senate then proceeded to consider the recommendation of the committee of conference that certain amendments be made to the text of the bill; and "The recommendation of the committee was unanimously agreed to.

"So it was

"Resolved, That the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 234) to incorporate the National Capital Insurance Company; and that the Senate do also unanimously agree to the amendments to the text of the bill as recommended by the committee of conference."

And the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives to that effect. Thus it will be seen that when a committee of conference have undertaken to amend the text of a bill it has always been done by the Senate agreeing to it unanimously and on that basis alone. That is the point I make in regard to this report.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to enter into the controversy about the question of parliamentary law; but it is right that the Senate, or if not the Senate the country, should understand that the committee of conference of the Senate of the United States have recommended precisely the same proposition in its legal import—no possible alteration can be made—that the Senate voted upon and rejected about two weeks ago. The proposition which came from the House to amend the Constitution originally—House joint resolution No. 402—was met in the Senate by amendments. Those amendments passed in the Senate by a two-thirds vote. They were sent to the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives disagreed to those amendments and asked for a committee of conference. The Senate did not assent to that request, but they receded from their own amendments, and the question came up directly on that which the committee of conference now recommend in legal import. A few words are altered at the end about any citizen or class of citizens, but they have no shadow of effect in altering the meaning of the article. The committee of conference have, then, presented to the Senate, by way of amendment, precisely the same proposition that, by a vote of 81 against 27, the Senate of the United States rejected, I think, last Tuesday week. I do not know, I cannot tell, what may be the motives which actuated the votes of honorable Senators then. They may change those votes to-day; but if those votes remain this amendment is lost, because it is the same which has already been rejected. It is for them to explain to their own constituents and explain to the people of the United States the grounds and reasons of the change of a vote given after a full discussion before, after the Senate had receded from all its own amendments, when the direct proposition came before them; and that same amendment is the amendment now proposed to us to be adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. The question is upon concurring in the report of the committee of conference. I shall vote to concur in the report not because this amendment of the Constitution as presented is entirely satisfactory to me, but because I think that it is at present the best that can be obtained. I must content myself, therefore, with the best I can get and run the risk of the future.

I desire to call the attention of Senators to the peculiar wording of this amendment and to its application in the future. I had hoped that the amendment which we should adopt at this session of Congress would have the effect to put an end to all further discussions throughout the country as to the political status of the colored man. I think that has really been the great object at which we have all aimed. I wish this amendment accomplished that object. It possibly may do so; possibly it may not. It will be observed from the language of the report now before us that it does not confer upon the colored man the right to vote. I wish it did; because if it had that effect it would for the future put an end to all controversy respecting his political right as a voter in the United States. As to his right to hold office that, in my judgment, would follow almost as a matter of course. At any rate it would be a subject about which I should have no concern for the future; for a person possessing the right of voting at the polls is inevitably in the end vested with the right to hold office under the Government of which he is a voter. This, however, confers no right to vote. It declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged," &c., without imparting the right itself.

Suppose that after the reorganization of the Government in the State of South Carolina, for example, the voters in the State shall see fit to divest the colored man there of his right to vote. They certainly have a right to do so, under the reserved rights of the States as one of the States of the Union; and the only mode in which the right to vote could be restored to the colored man in that State would be under the subsequent clause in this amendment giving to Congress power to carry out and effectuate this clause by appropriate legislation, so that Congress would then, if it saw fit, step in and remedy the defect of the State law and restore to the colored man his right to vote. This might be the case in more than one of the States of this Union. It might, indeed, be the case in all States of the Union; and Congress would be called upon to exercise an authority under the second clause of this amendment, and to impart by direct congressional legislation to the colored man his right to vote. No one can dispute this.

Suppose that after having passed such an act of Congress thus conferring the right upon the colored man a subsequent Congress should see fit to overhaul our action on the subject and take away from the colored man the right to vote. That might be done, because the action of one Congress does not necessarily bind a subsequent Congress in regard to its action. So that this question of negro suffrage, as it is called, will still be a subject for political discussion and wrangling for perhaps all time to come; and this amendment, as to which its authors fondly hope will put an end to all this discussion for the future, in my judgment does no such thing, but rather holds out to the future the same subject as a theme for political wrangling and discussion; and there is no possibility of foreseeing the time at which the great negro question will be put to rest.

These are some of the difficulties, and the main difficulties, which I see growing out of this particular form of the amendment. I hope it will work well; I trust it will; but I cannot refrain from pointing out to the Senate the difficulties which I foresee may take place in the future growing out of this same amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Kansas to raise the question of order whether under parliamentary law we were entitled to pass upon this question which is now submitted to us in this report. Certainly, if there be anything in the question; as I think there is, it can be no other than a question of parliamentary order.

The history of the proposition is this: the Senate passed a joint resolution—which is the original proposition now before us—and sent it to the House, declaring that the right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold office should not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. I believe I quote the exact language, or substantially, sufficiently for my purpose. The House of Representatives agreed to that with two proposals of amendment. The first was to strike out the words "the United States," so as to leave the prohibition applying to the States in their individual political capacity alone; and second, to add to the enumerated grounds of prohibition three others than those proposed by the Senate—nativity, creed, property. The Senate disagreed to those proposals of amendment, and a conference was the result.

Now, what were the powers of that conference committee? If there is anything that is settled in parliamentary law, if there is anything that is settled in the proprieties of legislative proceedings, it is that there was confided to those gentlemen only the question of discussing the points of disagreement arising between the two Houses. Now, was the question of office-holding one of those points of disagreement? No man will say that; because both bodies had voted for it. The points of disagreement were first on striking out the words "the United States," which may be set aside as not material to this inquiry; and second, as to modifying or restraining what we had proposed on the subject of the causes of exclusion—race, color, or previous condition of servitude—and adding further and other causes in respect to which we would deny to the States the power of legislation or political action. These were the only things that were sent to this committee of conference; they were the only subjects which the Senate and House of Representatives were willing or could have been willing to confide to their discretion, because they were the only points and causes of disagreement. Now we find that the committee report that they have agreed to recommend that the House of Representatives recede from both its proposals of amendment and agree to the resolution of the Senate to which it had already agreed, with an alteration of the substance, I may say because I feel it, the life of the text of the resolution.

My friend from Kansas has shown from the Journals of this body that there never has been an instance so far as he has gone in which a committee of conference has attempted to go outside of the subjects of disagreement and to change that which had already been agreed to except where both Houses, dispensing by unanimous consent with all rules of order, have agreed unanimously to make some phraseological change.

Now, what does this propose to do? It proposes to strike out from this constitutional amendment one half of all it contains. It proposes to say, "While we will leave to the States of this Union the power to deny one class or many classes of their citizens the right to be voted for, the right to represent and to protect in a legislative way their own citizens, we will deny to a State the power of saying that they shall not choose." If this were a mere question of technicality, if it did not involve a great principle, I certainly should not raise any point of order upon it; but feeling, as I did in committee, that it was merely asserting the shadow while it wiped out the substance, that it was flying in the face, so far as peace and progress are concerned, of all history and all experience, I felt obliged to decline to sign this report on the ground, among others, that it had gone entirely beyond any authority that the committee had to treat upon the subjects of disagreement between the two Houses.

But suppose that, as we sometimes do in this body in order to attain what gentlemen may suppose to be a great end, we fly in the face of the law, break down the barriers that parliamentary propriety and the success of good legislation have imposed upon us by our own consent, and disregard the law, where do we find ourselves then on the merits of this proposition? What are the failures that we are attempting to redress by a change in the fundamental law of the nation? What is the grand moving cause that impels us to withdraw from the States of this Union who have hitherto exercised its entire power over the political question of the right of suffrage and the right to hold office? Is it not that in many of these States there are large classes of citizens who are practically ostracised from the Government, and who therefore reside in a community that, while it has the shadow and pretense of republicanism, has none of its reality? Most certainly it is; and therefore you intend to interpose the nation's will, found in the assent of three-fourths of the States, to compel a real republicanism and a real democracy in these States; and what are the steps on this report that you propose to take to do it? You propose to take the very steps—I repeat what I said a moment ago on that subject—you propose to take the very steps that all history has demonstrated to be deadly to a republic. To be sure the instances are not frequent, for few peoples have been so wanting in intelligence and in a knowledge of the philosophy of a republican government as ever to institute a distinction between the right of a citizen to participate, if he is to participate in the government at all, entirely; and if you give him the right to have a voice in the government, that voice cannot have any live expression unless it enables him to choose from among his fellow-citizens the man who suits him for his representative, instead of confining him, as this amendment does, to a chosen aristocratic class, saying to a citizen of a free republic, "You have rights of manhood, you have rights of equality, but you shall exercise those rights in choosing some one of us to rule over you instead of some one of your fellow-citizens whom you prefer."

There is no instance within my knowledge of history for the last five hundred years in any country where the people have any rights at all of political action where there has been attempted the method that is proposed in this amendment of excluding the mass of the community from exercising the powers of government in the way of being voted for and representing their fellow-citizens instead of merely having the boon that the plebeians in Rome had to vote for the aristocratic magistrate selected from among the patricians. Now, sir, do we wish to set up a patrician class in these southern States? Do we wish to try an experiment that has overthrown the most civilized of ancient Governments? It would seem that we did by this amendment. It would seem as if in our eagerness to do something with the Constitution we had forgotten entirely that it was of any consequence to know what we were to do and to what end. Why, sir, we have an illustration before our eyes that has been pressing itself upon our attention for months on this very subject. You have in this nation at this day in one of the very States upon whom this Constitution is to operate an illustration of the result you will come to by adopting an amendment of this kind, an amendment which, containing half of an inseparable, indivisible, and united truth, is in reality a falsehood; and that State is Georgia. You will find, if you let the thing run on, that the example of Georgia will be imitated in all the other States, and you will have set up in this Republic a class aristocracy depending not upon intelligence, upon which some philosophers say a distinction may be made—I do not go into it—depending not upon faith or creed, upon which some enthusiasts suppose a distinction may be made, but depending upon the mere accident of the complexion of a human being, whom you say, as far as you go, is entitled to equal rights and privileges as a citizen of the country.

Now, can you defend that before an intelligent public? Will it be successful with an intelligent public? Are you not making progress backward as fast as you can in the race of life by proposing a proposition of that kind? Are you not giving to the people the mere husk and shell of the feast of political equality to which you invited them, reserving the substance and juices to yourself?

It is repugnant, Mr. President, to all my notions of a free Government; it is repugnant, I know, to all the notions of the people whom I represent as entering into the very framework and heart of any Government that professes to be or can duly be called a republican one. And where is the necessity for taking this half step, as some gentlemen argue it, of getting all you can if you cannot get the rest? Is it to be found, so far as we have yet heard, in any argument of the intrinsic propriety of the thing? Not at all. No Senator has raised his voice to defend the right of any State to say while you give a man the right to vote you shall not permit him to be voted for. I do not know but that we shall hear it yet, though nobody has heard it so far. What is the reason, then? Some vague fear, I suppose, fills the mind of some trembling convert to liberty that his people will not be satisfied to give the negro the right to run against themselves for some office, but they are willing to confer upon him the boon of voting for them. I do not believe in that, sir. As I have said, I believe it to be ruinous to the Government if it is carried out. I believe it to be an outrage upon the good sense and the patriotism of the country; and so believing—though I do not wish to occupy time in stopping its progress if my political friends think it best to pass it—I have felt bound to say so.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, for nearly thirty-three years I have at all times and on all occasions, by word and by vote, done what I could against slavery and everything relating to it and connected with it. I have asked always for what was right and taken on all occasions what I could get. I have acted upon the idea that one step taken in the right direction made the next step easier to be taken. I suppose, sir, I must act upon that idea now; and I do so with more sincere regret than ever and with some degree of mortification. In the early part of this session, before the month of December passed away, I had hoped that the majority in Congress would seize the great occasion which was presented, when the hearts, minds, and souls of the people, after having passed through a great struggle, were deeply imbued with the love of liberty and the sense of justice, and we had twenty-five State Legislatures in the hands of our friends, and take the responsibility of submitting to the Legislatures a proposition to amend the Constitution so as to secure to the colored citizens of this country the right to vote and be voted for. But day after day, week after week, month after month passed away without action.

Then, sir, came the proposition, I think a very lame and halting one, providing that colored men should have the right to vote, but silent about the right to hold office. The Senate amended that proposition by a comprehensive amendment, an amendment that covered more than the black man, for it covered the white man and prohibited distinctions on account of nativity, property, education, or creed. Sir, I have no doubt that if that amendment could have reached the people it would have been the strongest amendment ever submitted to the American people. Outside of a few localities in New England and on the Pacific coast there could have been no resistance to it. In the great central States and in the West, and especially in the West, there is not a square mile on which men could have stood and made opposition to it.

Sir, it would have swept away any formation that dared to stand against it; but it was rejected in the other House; it was met by opposition from quarters from which I did not, I confess, expect it in Congress and out of Congress. It received, I think, very narrow criticisms, inspired more by notions and theories than by a sense of absolute right and justice. If the black man in this country is made equal with the white man—and I hope he soon will be—I mean, by the blessing of God, while I live to hope on and to work on to make every white man equal to every other white man. I believe in equality among citizens—equality in the broadest and most comprehensive democratic sense; No man should have rights depending on the accidents of life.

We passed the amendment of the Judiciary Committee, allowing citizens without distinction of race, or color, or previous condition to vote and to be voted for. That amendment was returned to the House of Representatives with an amendment like the amendment originally adopted by the Senate, with the exception of the word "education." Under the lead of the Senator from Nevada we referred the matter to a committee of conference, and now the committee of conference bring us this proposition, which is the original report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, with the right to hold office stricken out. Senate proposition and House proposition both gave the right to hold office. Why does the conference committee strike out a provision agreed to by both Houses?

The Senator from Vermont tells us that we are in favor of giving the right to vote, but will not give the right to hold office. I am going to vote for this proposition without taking any responsibility for it. I am not responsible for this half-way proposition. I simply take it at this late hour as the best I can get after having struggled for the right to vote and the right to hold office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask my friend how he knows that this is the best he can get? He can never get anything better if he does not try.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will vote with me to disagree to this report and ask for a further conference. I propose to move, as soon as I can get the floor, that the Senate disagree to this report and ask for a further conference.

Mr. WILSON. If there is an opportunity to get the right to hold office I will do it; I take no risk, for I am determined to take what I can get if I cannot get all I demand. The Senator from Vermont, however, ought to see that his argument can be used with effect against us in States in supporting the amendment, if it be put in the form he desires. The Senators and members of Congress and newspaper correspondents and newspapers ought to see it. In the State of Connecticut the first great battle is to be fought, and right in sight of that people are thousands of naturalized citizens that cannot vote unless they hold $134 worth of real estate. What will the enemies of the measure say? They will say, as they have done, "This is only a negro question." If the amendment was as broad as the Senate originally passed it I should like to see the man on the soil of Connecticut who could stand up and fight the proposition. If he did he would fight against the rights not only of the black man, but the rights of thousands of adopted citizens in a neighboring State. Could the Catholic fight against a constitutional provision that secured to men of his faith the right to hold office in spite of the constitution of New Hampshire?

Now, for one, if this amendment goes to the people in this form, I protest against any inference that I am not in favor of colored citizens holding office, not in favor of protecting adopted citizens, not in favor of protecting men in their equal rights, on account of religious belief, property, or educational qualifications. I am in favor of protecting citizens against all these qualifications, and I mean, by the blessing of God, by speech and act, to work for the enjoyment of the absolute right of citizens in the States to vote and hold office without regard to race, color, previous condition of servitude, nativity, property, or religious faith.

There is one thing I remember—and I want Senators to think of this, and if there is a chance to appoint a new committee and get something better, as is indicated by a member of this last committee—I want them to remember that in the constitutional convention of Georgia Mr. Ackerman, one of the ablest men of that State, a lawyer of eminence and high character, proposed that the constitution should provide not only for the black man's voting, but for the black man's holding office. A few timid, conservative, halting, short-sighted Republicans were afraid to meet the people of Georgia on a plain, square, and direct issue, and they got together, consulted, held consultations over it, got scared, and went into the convention; and all the men in that convention, with the exception of twelve, including black men, backed square down.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They thought that was all they could get, I suppose.

Mr. WILSON. They did not try to get more. They went to the people of the State, talked with a forked tongue, one class of politicians saying that the negro had the right to vote but no right to hold office, and the other class saying that he had the right to vote and to hold office. They elected quite a number of black men to the Legislature. The black men in their magnanimity and generosity—for there never was a people so magnanimous, so generous, so forbearing, and so good-hearted toward those who have been their enemies as the black men of this country—allowed unrepentant and unforgiven traitors to sit in the Legislature with them, and the moment those men got the power they hurled the black men out of the Legislature. There are no Senators sitting here from Georgia on account of that action, and we have passed months and we do not yet see the remedy.

Do not tell me, sir, that the right to vote carries with it the right to hold office. It does no such thing. If there is nothing said about it the fair inference is that it does, but if there is a provision in a State constitution otherwise silence does not annul or overthrow that constitutional or legal declaration. No man in the world has a right to hold an office. The people have a right to vote, and they have the right to put terms and conditions to the offices that they make.

Mr. Webster said in the constitutional convention of Massachusetts, in 1820, that no man had the right to hold office, but the people had a right to define and make the terms and conditions upon which offices should be held. I do not believe in anybody's right to make terms and conditions founded on race or color that cannot be overcome; but many of the States have done it, and silence will not overthrow what they have done. I believe, however, that if the black men have the right to vote they and their friends in the struggle of the future will achieve the rest. Therefore I am willing now to give them the right to vote if I cannot get for them the right to be voted for. I will take that if I cannot get any more. The adoption of the amendment will not close the question, as I had hoped we should be able to do within the next few months, for I have no doubt if we submit the broad, square proposition to the people of this country before the 1st day of January next we shall have a constitutional amendment adopted which will cover the whole ground, and the great struggle will be closed, and closed forever.

I want to see the rights of the negro secured, for I want to see this negro question out of the politics of the country. I want to see everybody's rights absolutely secured; and then let us sit down here and see to it that the constitutions and laws are enforced, that men practically have their rights, and go to work and build up this nation and make it what it ought to be—the foremost nation of the world. That is our work. But here we have passed through ten years of struggle; we have had to gather every triumph of human rights step by step, a little at a time; but by the blessing of God the final fruition will come some time, and we will work on for that end. If I cannot get all, I will take a part.

Now, if there is a chance for a new conference committee, I am for it; if not, I am for adopting this report. I cannot take the responsibility of defeating this amendment that secures suffrage if it does not secure the right to hold office to citizens without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate disagree to the report of the committee and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEWART. I rise to a point of order. The motion to concur is first in order, and I wish to say to the Senate—

Mr. POMEROY. Let us have the point of order submitted to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. STEWART. My motion to concur is pending, and that has precedence.

Mr. POMEROY. The question before the Senate on the report of the committee of conference is, of course, to concur with the report; but pending that question I apprehend the Senate have a right, before deciding whether to concur or not, to recommit the bill to the same committee or to disagree and ask for a further conference. If this committee desire it I am willing to change the motion so as to move to recommit the subject to the same committee; but if they do not desire that, I want a vote on the question whether we shall have a further conference.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to suggest to the honorable Senator that there can be no object in taking a vote on a motion to disagree. It is simply transposing the motions. The motion as it now stands is to concur. If that motion is disagreed to, of course we do not agree to the report, and then it will be in order to move for a further committee of conference. I suggest to the Senator further that as a two-thirds vote is necessary to concur, he is stronger on the proposition as it now stands than he would be if he puts an affirmative question on disagreeing; because then he must get at least a majority, whereas if the present motion fails by a tie the question will be decided as he wants it decided.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senate has just listened to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, in which he said that if he cannot get anything better he will vote for the proposition of the committee of conference in its present form, but he wants first to see if he cannot amend it and get it in a better shape.

Mr. CONKLING. But the Senator from Massachusetts would not be more likely to vote for a motion to disagree than he would be to vote to disagree on the present motion. The vote is the same; the difference is merely in the form of putting it.

Mr. POMEROY. No; there are several Senators who would not feel at liberty to defeat this measure who would vote to send it to a new committee.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a different motion if the Senator moves for another committee of conference; but his proposition, as I understand it, was to disagree to this report. That is the present motion put the other way.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to disagree to this present report, in order to refer it to a new committee, not for the sake of defeating the measure by any means.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Kansas wishes to move to recommit this report to the present committee, that, I submit to him, might be a useful motion, and might enable Senators like the Senator from Massachusetts to try the experiment they desire; but if he wishes to move to disagree with a view to commit it to another committee, then I submit to him that this present motion presents that precise question, because should the Senate disagree to the report it will, of course, be in order to ask for another conference.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to call attention to the fact that the Chair has decided the motion of the Senator from Kansas to be out of order; and if I am right, of course the proceedings which are being taken are out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is a very plain one. It is moved that the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference. That motion is first to be put, according to the order laid down in the rules. If that fails, of course the Senate disagrees.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to ask if the Chair decides that the motion of the Senator from Kansas is out of order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is out of order, though it does not differ from the other. The other motion must be put first, but the same result is reached.

Mr. CONNESS. Both motions cannot be pending at once.

Mr. POMEROY. The reason I preferred the form I suggested was that there are several Senators who do not feel at liberty to vote to disagree to this report if the vote is a final one, but who want to make every earnest, honest effort to get a better report.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, why not move to recommit it? That will enable them to try that.

Mr. POMEROY. There are several Senators who desire to have a new committee of conference appointed.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, they must disagree to this report.

Mr. POMEROY. With the understanding that if we disagree we can have a new committee of conference, I shall vote to disagree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate refuse to agree they disagree, and all the consequences of that follow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair on a question of order. Suppose we do not concur in this report of the committee of conference, is the measure thereby defeated or are we then at liberty to ask for another conference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Another conference can be asked for.

Mr. MORTON. I shall probably vote for this report made by the committee of conference, because I think I cannot do any better, for the reason that the time within which to act is so short. Time is important, and I am afraid if this matter is referred to another committee of conference the resolution may be lost altogether. I go upon the principle of taking half a loaf when I cannot get a whole one; but nevertheless I want to say that it is pretty hard to accept the half loaf when a whole one or almost a whole one has been offered to us and has been rejected by the committee of conference. I was somewhat surprised to find that this committee should report to us a proposition that has been rejected by every vote of the Senate from the time we first commenced voting upon it. This proposition has been rejected by every vote from first to last; and yet the Senate is now required to slunk through and to cut this pretty figure by the committee of conference.

The first proposition sent over by the House of Representatives was in substance that which the committee of conference have agreed upon, that the right to vote should not be denied by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servi-tudé. We rejected that, and we sent to the House of Representatives in lieu of it a proposition declaring that there should be no discriminations in any State among the citizens of the United States in the exercise of the elective franchise or in the right to hold office in any State on account of race, color, nativity, education, or creed.

The House of Representatives rejected that and sent us back substantially their first proposition. We took a vote upon that, and we rejected it by a vote of 31 to 27, after very full discussion. That was the second time it had been done in substance. We then sent back to the House the following proposition:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The House refused to receive that in part, but sent it back with the following alterations:

Strike out the words "United States" and insert after the word "color" the words "nativity, property, or creed."

The House had come exactly to our first proposition which we had sent to them, with the single exception of the word "education," and the House had agreed with us fully on the proposition that the right to vote or to hold office shall not be denied by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. So far the two Houses were agreed; so far they had concurred, and the points upon which they disagreed were simply the insertion of the words "nativity, property, or creed," and the striking out of the words "the United States." They had agreed upon everything else, and this was the only matter that could properly be submitted to the committee of conference. They had no right to go behind and consider that in regard to which the two Houses had agreed and to make for us a new proposition that had been rejected by the Senate by every vote that had been taken; but they have done it. The Senate has been backed down from all its votes and has been now brought to the first proposition sent to the Senate by the House.

Mr. President, I think this action on the part of the committee of conference was unwise.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to ask the honorable Senator a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall we understand him to affirm that the managers on the part of the Senate in a conference have no right, using his expression, to agree to any item in a bill which the Senate has previously rejected?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I did not make that assertion, but the assertion I do make is that in so far as the two Houses of Congress have concurred a committee of conference has no right to take back that concurrence and give them a new proposition.

Mr. STEWART. We have not done it.

Mr. MORTON. They have done it exactly. The two Houses of Congress had concurred thus far, that no State shall deny the right to vote or to hold office on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. So far they had fully concurred; they had come together; and they had disagreed only upon inserting the words "nativity, property, or creed," and striking out "the United States," and it was that disagreement that this committee had a right to consider, and that only. Of course the committee intended no such thing; but it was hardly respectful to the Senate to report here a proposition that had been rejected by every vote of the Senate and to disregard that upon which the two Houses had agreed.

I may be compelled to take this proposition just as it is because at this late hour of the session if I do not take it I may not get anything; but I must say that I dislike very much to be forced by a committee of conference to take a proposition that has been so uniformly rejected by this body.

Mr. President, as the proposition came to us from the House, with the exception of the single word "education," it was just what we sent to the House some week or ten days ago.

The House had substantially come to our ground, and when they got there we deserted from our ground. There may have been reasons for that desertion, but they have not been assigned.

There are some other elements connected with the suffrage question besides that of color, and it was proper for us to say in the Constitution, when we came to amend it upon this subject, that the right to vote should not be denied to any citizen of the United States on account of his nativity. It is a great democratic principle that we recognize in our hearts; and when we came to amend the Constitution it was proper to put it in. Sir, it would appeal strongly to the hearts of a large part of the population of this country, and was proper as a safeguard against any future Know-Nothing excitements or movements.

Then, there was that other word "property;" the provision that the right to vote should not be denied on account of a want of property. That appeals to a strong democratic sentiment; it is the establishment of a republican principle that most of us recognize; and when we come to amend the Constitution on this subject it is proper to put that principle in. It appeals to a strong republican sentiment that is rife throughout the whole nation.

And it was proper to say, too, as another essential republican principle, that the right to vote and to hold office should not be denied on account of religious faith or creed. Do we not recognize that as being a true and sound principle? What was the objection to putting that in? We had agreed to it; the House had agreed to it, and yet the committee report to us a proposition rejecting it. Sir, as a question of public sentiment and favor the proposition as it came back to us substantially from the House the last time would be far stronger before the people than the simple one of confining it to color or race, and then we are liable to this charge which will now be made and the force of it we can hardly avoid; it will be said that we are willing that the negroes shall vote provided they vote for white men, but the offices but must be reserved for white men. We can say, of course, that we do not mean that; but they will come back on us and say, "When the proposition was made in the Senate, and after it had been concurred in by both Houses, that the words 'to hold office' should be put in, why did you strike them out?" What answer have we to make?

As I said before, my position is peculiar. I will take what I can get and even be thankful for that. But, sir, to have the proposition in its length and breadth, as we desire it, rejected after both Houses had substantially agreed to it seems to me to be more than we bargained for when we appointed the conference committee, and I will never agree hereafter to submit any important proposition of this kind to a conference committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it seems to me that the argument of the Senator from Indiana demonstrates that a constitutional amendment ought never to go to a conference committee. The subject is too important. The two Houses should act independently, each House should act for itself on the question until they come to an agreement by a discussion of the proposition; but now what do we see? There are many gentlemen here who are entirely dissatisfied with this proposition who yet say that they may feel constrained to vote for this for fear they can get nothing else. It is not because their judgments approve it, but there is a kind of constraint that is brought to bear on them to force this measure through the Senate.

Without taking up time, for I have no disposition to waste the time of the Senate, I wish to refer to one thing. The ink that wrote the constitutional amendment which has already been adopted, which has in a certain sense been forced on the people of the South, as I may say, by the reconstruction policy adopted there, is hardly yet dry upon your statute-books; and that constitutional amendment which has been adopted, in principle and as a fundamental principle of the party in power and holding the control in Congress, recognized it as one of the essential rights of the States, each for itself, to determine the right of suffrage; and the only inducement held out by that proposition to the States of the South to induce them to extend the suffrage to the colored men of the South was to extend the amount of their representation in the Congress of the United States by counting in the enumeration those persons who had lately been emancipated.

That left the question where it ought to be left. Each State should judge for itself of the qualifications of its own electors, for in different States with different populations a uniform rule of suffrage may not be the best rule of suffrage throughout the United States. Take California and the Pacific coast, which in a very few years will have not only hundreds of thousands but perhaps millions of Chinese and other Asiatics, and it may not be wise to put the government of those States into their hands. You are about to reorganize or recast your naturalization laws. Bills are pending on that subject. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has a bill, proposed by him, to strike the word "white" out of the naturalization laws, to extend all the benefits of naturalization to the Chinese as well as to men of European descent, and with the passage of these bills citizenship will be conferred upon this vast population to be poured into those States from Asia.

Now, is it wise for us to put the governments of the Pacific States into the hands of the Asiatic population? Is it not better that we leave the political power in those States where we find it, in the hands of our own people and our own race, who can best judge when this right of citizenship shall be extended to the Chinese? Sir, is it wise after all for the party now in power to be dissatisfied with what they have just done, to be dissatisfied with the constitutional amendment which they have taken such pains to force upon the people of the South, and by which they give each State the power to regulate the question of suffrage for itself?

Mr. President, I shall not go over this ground; I have trodden it before, and all the considerations which ever pressed upon my judgment press upon me now to appeal to gentlemen who have the majority, who control the action of this body by a majority of four fifths, to let this amendment go and leave to the States something of the high prerogative which belonged to them in the beginning and has ever belonged to them, and which is essential to their existence as independent and republican States, to judge each State for itself as to who and what citizens shall exercise the right of suffrage within their borders.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. President, I suppose rather than vote finally against this amendment I shall vote for concurrence in the report of the committee of conference; but before doing it I wish distinctly to place before Senators the view of the case which occurs to those who represent the recently reconstructed States. We have for two years been subject to the charge in those States that the Republican party of the northern States put the negro on one platform in the loyal States and upon another platform in the lately disloyal States. We have been constantly called upon to repel this charge of a want of impartiality in the treatment toward the negro in the several sections of the country. We have been constantly asserting that this could not properly be laid at the feet of the National Republican party, but that it was on account of some few weak-kneed Republicans, men who did not dare to stand up for the right in the full Republican faith and doctrine in the several States, and that wherever the question was fairly submitted to the national Republican party it would be decided in favor of the equal position of the negro with the white man before the law.

Now, Mr. President, we are asked to accept an amendment of the Constitution which pleads guilty to the charge; we are asked to go back to our people and say to them that the national Republican party, as represented in Congress, acknowledges that the charges which have been made by the late unrepentant rebels against that party are true. Now, I do not know that I shall not vote for this report rather than to lose any and all propositions on this subject; but I believe that in some of the States which have been recently reconstructed the Legislatures, strongly Republican as they are, will hesitate before they adopt this amendment. I believe there is quite as much risk of its being lost in a number of those States as there is in its being lost in an equal number of northern States if you put into the proposition the right to hold office.

You may say, and Senators on this floor do say, that the right to vote involves the right to hold office. I say the discussions on this floor, and the private opinions of Senators as expressed in debate, show that that proposition is denied; and I put it to the individual conscience of each Senator on this floor whether he is not wanting in perfect clearness about that fact. We know certainly that the gentlemen of the Democratic party on this floor do not entertain this view. We believe that there are many Republican Senators on the floor who do not entertain this view. At any rate it will go before the country that a proposition to hold office has been suggested to form part of this amendment and that it has been deliberately voted down. If it means nothing why vote it down? If the right to vote carries with it the right to hold office, I ask you if to-day in Georgia the right to hold office is recognized by the Republican party?

I hold, Mr. President, that if we are to run a risk in this matter of losing this amendment because there are some States which will not adopt the proposition to hold office, it is better to run the risk in the direction of the right. Whenever it is necessary to run a risk in a matter of this sort, let us run it for the right and not for the wrong; and I appeal again to the conscience of every Senator on this floor on the Republican side of the House whether he does not believe that the right belongs to every citizen of the United States to carry a vote and to hold office if it belongs to any other man? Is not that the ground-work of the action of the Republican party in the past? And have we not preached that doctrine among ourselves? Have we not preached it to the people? And now when we come to propose a constitutional amendment shall we halt and stop short of what we believe is right and what every one of us has been preaching? I submit there is more danger of losing this proposition, of losing the confirmation of the amendment on this account if we have it half right than if we have it wholly right.

Now, the right to vote, as it seems to me, will inevitably be given to the colored men in the various States by—I do not like to use the term—the inexorable logic of events in the next five years. It cannot be refused. It will come as a matter of course in the States. If, therefore, the proposition to amend the Constitution is confined simply to the right to vote, it is a matter of not so much consequence as has been attached to it. But if, on the other hand, the Republican party desire to put fairly and squarely before the nation the platform upon which they have professed to stand in the past, the platform upon which we claimed in the South that they did stand upon, true to their professions and their principles they will make a constitutional amendment which is right and submit it to the people; and if the people vote it down let us wait until the public sentiment gets up to the right point.

This is the view which we take of it in the southern States. I do not wish to put my individual opinion—I presume there is no Senator from the lately reconstructed States who would desire to put his opinion—against the opinion of the wise men on this floor and defeat this amendment if they show a unanimity of opinion upon it; but when we see that there is a great division between those men who have been tried in the party and in the public councils for many years I submit we may be right. If I vote for this proposition, if I vote to concur in this report of the committee of conference, I do it with great reluctance, I do it with great hesitation, and I do it because I am advised that we must have something, and that this is the best we can get.

Mr. STEWART. I have refrained during this discussion from occupying time. I will not now occupy time, and I ask the friends of the proposition not to occupy time; but I must submit a few considerations to the Senate; I must make a few remarks just now upon the condition of the case as it has arisen.

It is said that if you cannot have it right do not have it at all. The question of what is right I suppose must be determined by the majority of the two Houses. There are no two Senators who agree as to exactly the thing which should be done. The Senator from Kansas has been pressing his motion for female suffrage; the Senator from Vermont wants to have office holding included; the Senator from Massachusetts wants to have nativity and creed inserted. Neither of these concurs with the other; one wants a c crossed this way, and another wants an i dotted that way; and thus it is that we lose time discussing little things that do not enter into the main question.

I wish to say right here that the question of suffrage is an important question. Two years ago about this time we had the question of suffrage in the southern States before the Senate; and I recollect what a trying time that was. A military bill came in here which handed the southern States over to the military; it was supported by the committee of fifteen; it passed the House; it was being pressed in the Senate; and I rose then and said it was necessary that there should be some voting in the South; that the ballot was the solution of this whole question, and that I would not support any proposition that did not require some voting to be done. Friends came to me and said, "What! will you break with the Republican party?" I told them no, I will stay with the Republican party; but the philosophy of the republican theory is that all men shall have the ballot. We had a caucus; it resulted in the military reconstruction bill upon which those States were reconstructed, and by which and through which the Senators from South Carolina, who are here to-day boast of a constituency that is more radical than Massachusetts. They think they are safe. But you are not safe everywhere; you are not safe in Georgia. That has been alluded to. You say it is because they have denied negroes the right to hold office that you are not safe in Georgia. It is not the reason. The reason is that their right to vote is in danger. If they can retain the ballot in Georgia they will force the power that exists there to give them the right to hold office. They hold the ballot in Georgia by a very slender tenure. You let Georgia come in here as she now is and the negro in Georgia will not have the ballot three weeks. Look at the practical example in Tennessee. The friends of equal rights gave the ballot there to the negro—

Mr. SAWYER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Not just now. Let me finish the sentence. The friends of equal rights in Tennessee gave the negro the ballot. The Democrats commenced at once to say to them: "You are good enough to vote; but not good enough to hold office." The Republican party then immediately in the Legislature—if I recollect rightly the Legislature had the power to amend the constitution—gave them the right to hold office; and that will be the result everywhere where the ballot is given. The Senator from South Carolina says that in five years the logic of events will bring this about. Sir, if we fail now, it never will be brought about. The States by individual action will not do it in his day or mine. You give the negroes in Maryland the ballot and they will demand their other rights, as they did in Tennessee. Give it to them in Kentucky and Delaware, and they will demand and obtain all their rights. The ballot is the mainspring; the ballot is power; the ballot is the dispenser of office. I wanted to insert the right to hold office in this proposition; but if I cannot give the poor and the downtrodden the right to hold office, I will give them the power to say who shall hold office and dispense office; and their natural selfishness will impel them to demand their full rights.

Mr. President, I have labored hard for this constitutional amendment. I have been earnest in my efforts to obtain it. I have not been a stickler for words. I have been willing to take any proposition that seemed likely to succeed, whether it was a House proposition or a Senate proposition. I was not anxious to be the author of the words. I accepted every proposition that was brought forward so long as there was any prospect of its success. But it is now so late in the session that if this proposition cannot be adopted none can be in my judgment. There is not time for another conference and another action of the House and Senate upon it. The appropriation bills are not disposed of. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations notifies me that he is about to antagonize his bill against this measure, and it must inevitably go. Every Senator must see that there is not time for further action.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And no chance at the next session.

Mr. STEWART. And no chance at the next session? Your Legislatures are waiting now, ready to act. Send it to another conference and the whole thing is lost.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There will be no chance at the next session, because there will not be a two-thirds vote there for it.

Mr. STEWART. And there must be two thirds in the other House. The proposition on your table received in the other House 143 votes to 43 votes, and it will receive in this body the entire Republican vote, as I understand, when they believe that nothing else can be obtained. I have labored here to obtain something else. I have labored to have the right to hold office inserted in the amendment, because I was willing to do the whole right; but that is impossible, and now I want to secure to all men the right to protect themselves with the ballot. The ballot has shown that it has potent effects in bringing loyal Senators to this Hall from the South. It has shown that it had potent effect in the South in reorganizing that country. It was the only expedient that could be substituted for the military power there; and it has worked better than we had any reason to anticipate. Now, I say, give to all men, regardless of race or color, the ballot, and they will secure to themselves all other rights. I appeal to the friends of the measure to vote for concurrence in the report of the committee. It is the only hope I have. I am willing to work night and day for any other proposition that shall be more acceptable to gentlemen until the end of the session; but I have no hope that we can go through the various stages of another proposition with any chance of success.

Mr. SAWYER. I should like to ask the Senator now the question which I rose to ask him before, and that is, what effect he thinks the passage of this amendment will have in the very case which he has cited in the State of Georgia? We go back to the people of Georgia and tell them that we indorse the precise position which the white members of the Legislature have taken; that is to say, that there is a question whether the negro can hold office or not.

Mr. STEWART. It will have this much effect: it will place in the hand of the black man of Georgia a rod of power before which all politicians quail. It will put into his hands a rod of power by which he can hold what position he has until there can be some further reconstruction to stay the hand of the oppressive rebel there, which is most outrageous.

Mr. GRIMES. They have got that now.

Mr. STEWART. How long will they have it?

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Nevada, who has just taken his seat, has made two appeals to his party that must bring them up to the work; they cannot escape it. In the first place, he says that unless the proposed amendment is passed now some of the Legislatures of the States will go out of office and existence and new Legislatures will have to be elected, and therefore the amendment cannot be passed. The honorable Senator from New Jersey gives him another item, which my honorable friend seizes upon in the fervor of the moment and uses with a great deal of force to bring his friends in this Chamber up to the work. He says that in the next Congress there will not be two thirds of the House who will be such Republicans as to be willing to pass this amendment. That presents the party in such a strait that it must upon compulsion do the work now. If the Legislatures hereafter to be elected are against or will be against the proposed amendment, as these two able leaders of the party in the Senate concede, what would become of the party if it did not pass this fifteenth amendment immediately and have all the political benefit which it is capable of giving? What would become of the party, too, if the amendment should now fall to the ground and it should be reproduced in the House on or after the 4th of March and it shall be found that the Republicans have not a majority of two thirds of the House to pass it?

But the case would not be so desperate as the honorable Senator stated. The party in the House would only have to resort to its ordinary tactics, and the tactics that have been practiced in this body also. They would only have to expel a lot of the Democratic members from the two Houses to give them the requisite majority of two thirds, and they would be in full possession again. They would only have to send back Mr. Stockton, from the State of New Jersey, and put in his stead his competitor when he was recently elected. They would only have to contest the seats of a couple of members from the State of Kentucky and a few members from other States and expel them from their seats, and then, instead of the people, the Republicans of the House elect their successors; and in that way they would put themselves in complete possession of two thirds of both Houses of Congress. I present this view to comfort my honorable friend from Nevada and also the honorable Senator from New Jersey, and to assure them that their case is not so desperate as it seems to be and is entirely within the reach of the medicines that they have heretofore applied to similar conditions both in the House and in the Senate. [Laughter.]

One word upon this amendment. I concede myself, as was assumed so truly and so ardently by my honorable friend from Nevada, that the power to vote is a higher and more effective power than the power to hold office. A class of people who should be necessitated to be deprived of one of those rights for their own efficiency, their own power to protect and defend themselves against oppression, in my judgment had better want the power to hold office than the power to vote. I make another concession in connection with this proposition: that the power to vote in my judgment implies the power to hold office; that is to say, it does not necessarily do so under the provision of this amendment, but a class of people who are entitled to vote and to whom by principles of right and good policy the right to vote ought to be conceded ought to have at the same time the concession of the right to hold office. If it was my principle that the negro was a proper depositary of the right of suffrage I would unhesitatingly vote in favor of extending the proposition and giving him the right to hold office, which I deem to be a right of less force and efficiency than the right to vote.

But, Mr. President, I deny that the negro has the proper capacity to exercise this right, and for that reason I vote inflexibly against—I oppose in every form that I can; I have from the beginning, and I will to the end—not restoring, but to giving to him in the first instance the right to either vote or to hold office. I deny that is a restoration of the right to the negro. The negro in the State of Kentucky never had the right to vote. He cannot be restored to that which he never possessed. He may have this right given to him as an entirely new right, but the idea of restoring to the negro the right to vote is all a delusion; there is no truth in it. I will not concede the right of the negro to hold office so far as my voice is involved because the majority of Congress choose to confer upon him the right to vote. I hold that he is incapable of a wise and safe exercise of either of those rights in our Government. The denial of those rights is not in conflict with natural right, because there is no natural right to vote or to hold office in any Government. I would not concede to him either of those rights, because I believe that they would prove in their exercise mischievous to the well-being of society at large, white and black, and not less to the negro population than to the white population.

Mr. President, it is nothing but a form of demagoguery to say that every man is entitled by nature to the right to hold office or to vote. Those are artificial rights. They are creatures of an artificial state and law of society. They do not exist as natural rights. They ought not to exist as universal rights, because the intelligence, the circumstances, and the condition of all nations differ. It might be very safe and proper in one community to give the whole political power to all the people, and it might be very unsafe in another nation and another community to give this right to the whole population. Sir, this is a truth in relation to all statesmanship and to the exercise of power by wise lawgivers: the political power of a country ought to be deposited where its exercise would produce the greatest good to all the people.

Gentlemen concede that idiots and lunatics have not either a natural or an artificial right to vote or to hold office. I ask them how they can give this right to a race of men who throughout their whole history, in every country and condition in which they have ever been placed, have demonstrated their utter inability for self-government.

Take the empire of Russia, with its eighty or one hundred million people, the most of them barbarians, ignorant, having no knowledge of autonomy or of the exercise of political power necessary to take care of such a vast community of people, would it not be preposterous and absurd in the highest degree to give to the population of that extensive and powerful empire the right to vote and the right to hold office?

Sir, look at the French. They have within the last century made repeated efforts at self-government. They commenced their great effort in 1789. They eventually became almost a democracy; and from that they degenerated into an oligarchy of demagogues. They proved their utter inability to exercise this right wisely and safely for the French people. The consequence was that the new system failed; it fell into ruin and anarchy and was succeeded by the first consulate and then by the empire. Napoleon was, however, deposed from his throne and Louis XVIII was called back to the throne of his fathers. He died and was succeeded by his brother, Charles X. Almost on a cloudless day a popular storm arose among the French people and drove Charles from his throne; and that introduced La Fayette and other republicans. They established a republic and the republic lasted but a day comparatively. It passed away because of the utter inability of the French people to perform the great and difficult office of self-government; either in person or by choosing wise and safe representatives to exercise this the greatest power in society. The consequence was that the republic yielded and Louis Philippe was driven from his throne; the third Napoleon was called back to take the position of power and of almost absolute government which his great uncle had exercised in France, not for the liberty, but the glory and power and grandeur of the French people. The idea that the right of self-government, the right to vote and hold office, could at this day be conferred upon the French people without those salutary and wholesome restraints which the ever present and watchful power of Louis Napoleon exercises over that people is as unsound a proposition as could be made in relation to politics and government.

Sir, the right to vote is not a natural right; the right to hold office is not a natural right. There ought not to be in any country, not excepting our own, a universal right, without regard to race or color, either to vote or to hold office. The problem has long since been solved, and it is settled now beyond reasonable controversy, that the people universally, without regard to race or color or condition of intelligence, are not capable of self-government; they cannot establish and maintain a uniform, well-adjusted, settled government. The universal race of mankind, whether in our own country or elsewhere, is wholly incompetent to the performance of such a great and important work as that. It is nothing but the sheerest demagogism to deny the truth of that position. It is proved by all history; it is proved by philosophy; it is proved to the satisfaction of every reading and reflecting man. In our country the only remaining problem is, not whether the white man and the negro and the Indian and the Mongolian and the Malay and all other races that may choose to come from the four quarters of the globe to the United States are capable of self-government or not. That is no longer a problem. The proposition when stated stands refuted by the truth of all experience and all history. Sir, the only remaining problem in our country, and it is a very doubtful one, is whether the white man is capable of self-government; and it is a problem that has not yet been established. I concede that the yearnings for liberty are irrepressible. They spring eternal in the human heart. No tyrant, no military power, no despotism can ever stifle it forever. It will break out and gather strength and heat and energy until it heaves off despotism of every form; but when the despotism is heaved off the work of self-government then begins, and it is a work a hundred times more difficult than to overthrow the despotism. Then comes the great question, of such momentous interest to the human family all over the earth, is the white race itself capable of self-government? It has not demonstrated the truth of that proposition to my mind.

When our fathers began their experiment of self-government it was under such favorable auspices, with so much of intelligence and virtue and after all the lessons of tyranny and oppression had been imparted to them, that I had indulged in the young dream and the conviction that our liberties had been established upon a perpetual and ever-enduring foundation. I have given up that fond delusion with the greatest reluctance. I do not believe that our people have yet demonstrated their ability to perpetuate the free institutions which have been handed down to them by the generation that formed them. It was a wiser, a nobler, and a more virtuous race that formed them and bequeathed them to us. Upon us has been devolved, if possible, a still more difficult task, and that is to preserve the heritage of liberty which was handed down to us by Washington and Franklin and Madison and their compeers. I believe that all of it is now in peril, that all of it is now in the most imminent danger. I believe that it is not only possible but very probable that within the next twenty years it may be overthrown. But when it is overthrown the people will never be satisfied to lose their natural, indestructible right and desire of self-government; they will still make a contest to regain it, and I begin to believe that the history and the destiny of man, even of the white man, is to make never-ending efforts after self-government, and never to be able to exercise it for any considerable period of time with wisdom and with firmness enough to maintain it.

With this view of the subject I should be false to my reason, to my convictions of the best interests of my country, and of all my country, white and black, if I could be induced to share the government of this country with the negro. I am so thoroughly convinced of his utter inability to take part in this great business of governing our country and that his sharing it would only introduce confusion, disorder, and great mischief, as well to himself as to the white man—it is that which has induced and will continue to induce me to vote always and inflexibly against it.

Mr. President, I believe, and I lay down this conclusion: in a country like ours, as populous as it will be in a few years, having such a variety of race, of natural productions, of interests, such diversity of opinion, religious, moral, and political, the people are too various in their interests, in their intelligence, in their characteristics, ever to be ruled by one central Government unless that central Government becomes a despotism. It may be the Government of a party; it will still be a despotism, and it must necessarily be so. It may be the Government of a faction; it will still be a despotism. It may be the Government of one man; and then it would be the Government of an absolute monarchy sustained by the bayonet and military power as the other forms of government would also have to be sustained. Sir, the wise men who framed our system of Federal Government and State governments understood their work. They were masters in the art and science of government and self-government. They knew what they were doing. They aimed to establish for this people both strength and liberty; strength by the establishment of a Federal Government to defend them against all foreign countries; strength by the establishment of a Federal Government to repress internal depredations and wars among the States; strength to maintain the just, limited, and wholesome powers delegated to the Government of the United States by the Constitution; but they knew at the same time that all the powers and all the rights of the States which have not been delegated by express language in the Constitution to the General Government it was necessary to maintain in order to perpetuate liberty. So, sir, the strength of our country is in its General Government and in the rights and powers and sovereignty delegated by the Constitution to that General Government; the liberty, the happiness, the peace of the people depend mainly upon the maintenance of the State governments and that sovereignty and those rights and powers which the States possess and which do not belong to the Federal Government or were not delegated by the Constitution to that Government.

Mr. President, as I said when speaking on the subject of this amendment when it was before the Senate on a former occasion, whenever the General Government assumes to exercise the power, and it is conceded to the General Government, acting under the form of an amendment to the Constitution or in any other form, to go into all the States and determine who shall vote in those States it implies the power to determine who shall not vote. The power of admission implies the existence of a power of exclusion. The one right can be exercised as legitimately as the other. The faction that admits all to-day may be succeeded by another faction next year or in the next decade who would want to exclude a portion by classes of those who had been admitted to the right of suffrage. So of the power to hold office. The power to decide who shall vote and who shall not vote and the power to decide who shall hold office and who shall not hold office is the essential power in all Governments. I defy any Senator or gentleman to controvert that position. The power in a State that has the right to determine who shall vote in the election of all officers—because now in all the States all officers are elected—and who shall not vote, and has at the same time the power to decide who shall hold office and who shall not hold office, exercises all the essential powers of government.

Sir, this attempt at this time in the form of amending the Constitution of the United States is simply an exercise of the power to revolutionize the Government. The existence of the State governments in our system of mixed State and Federal governments is as essential to the system as that of the Federal Government itself. I ask gentlemen who have the right to form a State government? Who but the people of the States? What power on earth can legitimately enter upon the work of forming or remodeling in their essential characters and principles the State governments except the people of the States? That is the inherent, reserved power of the people of the States. It is one that they never conceded by grafting upon the Constitution the power to amend it. If it had been specified in the Constitution that the power of amendment could ever have assumed a shape and would ever have been attempted to be exercised as is now attempted in the two Houses of Congress it would at once have dissolved the convention and it never would have formed a Government with any such practical principle in it.

Sir, this is simply an act of revolution. The veil of amendment that is sought to be thrown over it is too thin. It is revolting, it is absurd, and entirely usurping in its nature. This is a simple proposition to establish in the General Government a power supreme over the governments of the States, and that can at its pleasure, in any form that a majority of the two Houses of Congress may choose, exercise the power of amendment to revolutionize our system of General and State governments, to abolish our State governments, to bring those State governments to the feet of a tyrannical and despotic faction in the two Houses of Congress. That is now the position of things. This is no amendment. No man who understands the principles of our Constitution and our complicated system of blended governments would ever hazard his judgment and his knowledge of the principles of that system of government by asserting that this power existed under the Constitution in virtue of the restricted and qualified right and power that Congress has to propose amendments to the Constitution. No, sir; it is a bald, naked attempt to usurp power and to bring all the sovereign and reserved powers of the States to the feet of a tyrannical and despotic faction in Congress. That is the whole of it. That is the undisguised proposition; and an intelligent and virtuous Supreme Court, if the question could be brought before them and they would entertain jurisdiction of it, would so decide.

Now, Mr. President, utterly denying the power and right of Congress to revolutionize our mixed system of government, convinced as I am of the eminent impolicy of it and the mischief, wrong, oppression, and ruin it would bring upon the States by the overthrow of their governments, and the general destruction in which it would involve all the principles of the Constitution, upon these considerations I have taken ground against all these efforts of Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution that are in revolution of the essential nature and principles of our Government; and I intend to occupy that position. These are the reasons that have brought me up reluctantly on every occasion when our Government and its great principles were assailed in frank and open and earnest opposition to all such attempts. If any party with whom I have been associated in politics were to propose the same innovation, the same amendment, the same exercise of usurped power, the same revolution of our system of government that seems to me to be the persistent effort of the party now in power, I would stand as inflexibly and as immovably against the old Whig party, or the Democratic party or any new party, by whatever name it might be known, that would move forward in the same line of revolutionary destruction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought I addressed the Chair some time before the Senator from Indiana did.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the Senator from Maine had the floor, and then I thought the Senator yielded to the announcement of the question or I would not have sought the floor. The Senator from Maine certainly did have the floor before I sought it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After I rose the Chair proceeded to state the question, and I was waiting for the Chair to state the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor to allow a vote. I certainly did not desire to take the floor from him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference; and as it requires two-thirds to carry the motion, it must be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the Senator from Maine seems not to desire to go on, I have a very few remarks to make on this question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator give way for a motion?

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the motion?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The motion is to rescind the order for a recess.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I do not care to do that.

Mr. President, I think that the debate to-day has been more remarkable than at any time during the consideration of this question. I have been astonished at some of the appeals that have been made to the majority; and I desire to ask the attention of gentlemen of the majority to those appeals, that they will consider them now and see exactly how they will appear when they go to the country, because assuredly the conduct of the Senate upon this grave and important question will be very carefully regarded by the country.

The Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART;] whose name is connected now and for immortality with this measure as the leader in its management, has stated that it is important that we should pass it without delay, and what reason does he assign? The main reason was furnished to him by the Senator from New Jersey that in a few days—

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With the consent of the Senator from Indiana I will correct a misapprehension of fact and congratulate the Senator and the country that on inquiry I ascertain that the Republican party will have a clear working two-thirds majority in both Houses in the next Congress. Therefore I withdraw that argument.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator's withdrawal of the argument does not change the bad principle upon which he appealed to the majority to carry the measure through the Senate. He furnished to the Senator from Nevada the argument that on the 4th of March a new Congress would come in, and the judgment of the House of Representatives would then be against this measure. That House was elected last fall, and the judgment of the country has been expressed in that election to some extent—to a very little extent in my judgment upon this question; but it is supposed to be in our theory of government the last expression of the will of the people upon the subject. The argument is that if this question be allowed to go beyond the 4th of March it will fall into a House of Representatives, the popular branch of the Government, in hostility to the measure and the requisite two thirds cannot be obtained in that body to secure its passage.

Mr. President, if that were true it is a conclusive reason why the majority here ought not to pass it. Instead of being an argument in favor of its passage it is a reason why every Senator should vote against it. Our Constitution requires that before it shall be changed by the action of Congress two thirds of each branch shall concur. The presumption is that each branch reflects the popular will; the Senate reflecting the will of the States, and the House the will of the people; and that before the Constitution shall be changed at all two thirds of the people shall desire it. Now, the argument is that two thirds of the people at the last expression of their will—that is, at the election—declared against this measure, and elected members of the popular branch against it; and that to prevent the action of that popular will, its legitimate and constitutional force, we must pass it now; take advantage of the people when the accident of a two-thirds majority in the two branches gives the power to do it. So much for that argument.

The Senator from New Jersey now seems very happy in the contemplation of the fact, as he ascertains it to be, that there will not be a third of the members of the next House of Representatives in hostility to the party in the majority in the country. It was a happy suggestion by the Senator from Kentucky that the policy and practice of the party would enable them to secure a two-thirds majority, if they do not have it with the will of the people. There is a will in each House, as was suggested by him, above the will of the people; and that will goes upon the argument that was suggested by the Senators from Nevada and New Jersey, that the will of the people may come in after the 4th of March and prevent the passage of such an amendment as this; and so the practice of the party has been in Congress to disregard the will of the people, as expressed in the election, and turn members out until they get the control of the body by a two-thirds majority.

The Senator from Nevada said that no two Senators agree on any one proposition. That was his expression. I do not suppose he desires it to go so far as that. He expressed himself more strongly, I dare say, than he would desire. I think there are some two Senators who may possibly agree. But it is very clear that there is no general sentiment in favor of any one proposition in this body; but the Senator from Nevada too strongly expressed that thought, that in the Senate where we are considering this matter there is no settled conviction, no general opinion, upon the subject.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I intended to be understood that as to the Republican Senators they did not agree upon the precise phraseology to be adopted, but upon the general proposition I suppose they do agree.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator's explanation, as I understand it, is that the disagreement is in regard to phraseology. I never did observe in any popular body a dead-lock upon the question of the use of words. Webster furnishes a sufficient number to the majority in power; so that upon the question of phraseology they can certainly arrive at some general opinion. The truth of the matter is, Mr. President, as expressed by the Senator from Nevada, that there is no settled conviction in this body on the subject; one Senator wants one thing and another another thing; so that two thirds of the body up to this time have not agreed upon any proposition; and I say that the debate to-day shows that two thirds of the Senators are not in favor of this proposition.

Then, Mr. President, ought it to be adopted? If this proposition does not heartily command the judgment of a Senator ought it to be supported by him? My colleague expressed his views on this subject about in this way: that the amendment was not agreeable to him, and he made a rasping criticism upon the committee of conference; he did not like it; it was not proper; the committee had not treated the Senate well; on the contrary, the committee had treated the Senate very badly; but he said he would rather take half a loaf than have no bread. But, sir, it is not my colleague alone who is to take the bread now. He is acting for the people; he is acting for the States; and I say that when you come to the question of a change of the form and fashion of our Government it is not a question of half a loaf or a whole loaf. It is a question of the right. The question is, does this proposition command my judgment and my conscience so that I can fasten it on the people and the State I represent here?

The Senator from Massachusetts said that he found it easier to take the second step after taking the first step. That is not expressed in such objectionable phraseology as my colleague used, but still it is the same idea; and this idea of half a loaf—"if you cannot get what is right take something;" "we must have something, we have started in this business and it will not do to stop; we must have something, therefore if my judgment is not satisfied I will take what I can get"—that whole idea is expressed in the action of the Senate in referring this grave and important question to a committee of conference. Committees of conference are not the proper tribunals and organs of this body to which ought to be sent a constitutional amendment.

I admit that in ordinary legislation on appropriation bills and other measures it is proper when the two Houses cannot agree after a sufficient effort to agree that the subject be sent to a committee of conference to reconcile the disagreement; but in my judgment that mode of legislation ought not to be extended to a proposition so important as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and indeed it is becoming, as between the two Houses, in my opinion a great abuse in ordinary legislation. Bills are passed in one House, then the other House makes amendments, then the whole is sent to a committee of conference without that careful consideration in each case of the difference, and that effort on the part of the two Houses to reconcile the difference that ought to be made, as I think, before it is sent to a committee of conference. Each committee of conference, it is understood, shall give and shall take. If the House insists on an appropriation that the Senate is not satisfied with, and on the other hand the Senate insists upon an appropriation that the House does not agree to, the one shall give some that it may take some. That is the fashion and the style of a committee of conference, and very much bad legislation is the result of it; and I am not content when I see a proposed amendment of our form of government referred to a committee of conference to become the subject, not of judgment, not of conscience, but the subject of contract, of compromise in that committee, and then that the result of that effort should be brought back to each House and an arbitrary vote be required without the possibility of an amendment.

So far as I am concerned I repudiate the whole doctrine that we can take a half loaf, which expresses the idea that in the matter of an amendment of the Constitution it is proper to compromise, to adjust, to trade, if I may so express it. It is not right. When an amendment of the Constitution is made, that amendment ought to command in all of its provisions the judgments of two thirds of this body and two thirds of the House. Everybody sees from this debate—it is not covered up—we all know that two thirds of this body do not agree to this. My colleague is not satisfied with it. The Senator from South Carolina is not satisfied with it. Yet each intimates that in the way it is fixed now, in the shape it has fallen into, perhaps they will support it because they cannot get what does command their judgments; they will take something short of that, an objectionable measure.

Now, Mr. President, I have but very little to say about the measure itself, and the results of this committee of conference more particularly. The Senate, when they came to consider the question of protecting the colored man from legislation on the part of the States which would exclude him from the enjoyment of the franchise, thought it was right to protect three other classes, the poor man, the man who was born abroad, and the man of but limited education. Here is the amendment as it passed the Senate:

No discrimination shall be made among citizens of the United States in the exercise of the elective franchise, or in the right to hold office in any State on account of race, color, nativity, property, education, or creed.

The Senate when it decided to protect the colored man at the same time decided to protect the poor man from unjust legislation, the man who was born in another country and had become a citizen of our own, and the man whose religion might be unpopular. There is no occasion to protect the man whose religion is popular. In these times that protects itself; but the Senate thought it important to secure the protection of these three classes of persons; the poor man, the man whose religion was unpopular, and the man who was born abroad. That there ought to be protection to the foreign-born citizen was conceded by my colleague. He said it might become important at some future time of Know-Nothing excitement. This class is not perhaps sufficiently numerous to protect itself; therefore the Senate thought it was right to protect it, and to say that no legislation of the States hereafter shall take from him the right to hold office or to vote; that no State shall take from the poor man the right to hold office or to vote; that no State shall take from the man of religious creed which for the time being may not be popular the right to vote or to hold office. This was the position of the Senate, in part conceded by the House, and the committee of conference bring in their report.

Now, the judgment and wish of the Senate was clearly expressed, that while you protect the right to vote, you shall also protect the persons in the right to hold office. That is abandoned by the committee of conference. The committee of conference also abandon the protection of the poor man. How important it is to protect him in his political rights and privileges Senators can judge. In some States, I believe, to-day the poor man is not allowed to participate in the enjoyment of political rights; a property qualification is prescribed, and for that reason he is not allowed to hold office or to vote. Ought the poor man to be protected? Not, says the Senator from Nevada, if it shall endanger in its progress through the Senate or House the protection of the negro. Is it right to protect in the Constitution of the United States the religion of every man, and to declare that it shall never be made a reason for disfranchisement or for denying the right to hold office? The Senator from Nevada, the champion of this measure, concedes that it is right, provided it does not embarrass the negro measure in its passage through the two Houses.

Thus we have the result of the committee of conference before us. Now, Mr. President, I think that the legislation upon a proposed constitutional amendment should go on in the two Houses until they do agree; and if they cannot agree that no proposition should be adopted. That is the Constitution upon the subject. The resort to committees of conference has gone very much further than ever was allowed or is now tolerated in the British Parliament. In the British Parliament the committee of conference does not make a report upon which the houses must vote without modification or amendment; it is a committee of consultation, a comparison of views, and each committee goes back to its respective house and reports the result of its consultation, and by consultation it is sought to arrive at a common judgment upon a disputed question; but here a subject is reported upon by a committee of conference, as by authority, and then the argument is made use of at once that must be adopted, else all measures in relation to the subject will fail. While that is bearable and only tolerable in regard to measures of ordinary legislation I think it is intolerable when it is applied to an amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Propositions to amend it ought never to be the subject of bargain; they ought not to be the subject of party interests. Considerations of party interests ought not to enter into the judgment of the two bodies upon them.

I am not, Mr. President, going to discuss the merits of the measure. They have been sufficiently discussed. I intended simply when I arose to refer to the result of the action of the two bodies in the appointment of a committee of conference and the probable result being the passage of a measure in which two thirds of each branch do not, as shown by the debate, concur, but that the passage is secured by the machinery of a committee of conference.

Much of the argument that has been addressed to the majority here is like the argument that we have heard during the progress of this measure through the bodies, that the Legislatures of some of the States are now in session and are likely soon to adjourn. That argument means simply this: that we have got the chance now, and having the Legislatures of a particular political complexion we must put the measure through; it will not do to leave it open as a question for any future Legislature; and, as is suggested to me, that rests upon the idea that it is easier to do mischief than to undo it.

Upon the contests of last year the party of the majority in this body obtained a majority in many of the Legislatures. I think the Senator from Massachusetts said in twenty-five Legislatures. I am not sufficiently posted in questions of that sort to say, but I accept his statement as to twenty-five Legislatures.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Indiana give way until I move to rescind the order for a recess?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not now, sir.

Mr. STEWART. If he will not yield for that purpose, I desire to give notice that at half past seven o'clock this evening I shall call up this report.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This evening has been set apart for pension bills. The Senator had better say eight o'clock. I think I shall get through in an hour.

Mr. STEWART. Will not half an hour do?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I cannot get through in half an hour.

Mr. STEWART. I will say half past seven.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the whole of this argument rests upon this: that by a statement in the platform of last year the right to control suffrage in the States of the North properly belonged to the people of those States. Upon that platform a political majority was obtained in twenty-five States. Those twenty-five States, as I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts, stand now ready to ratify this constitutional amendment; and what proposition is that? That the people are against it but the Legislatures and Congress are for it. We will not let it go to the people either through conventions or Legislatures hereafter to be elected, but it must be hastily dispatched here, sent down to the States that Legislatures chosen upon an opposite platform may fasten it upon the people. Then, as suggested to me by the Senator from Kentucky, it becomes a difficult matter for the people, a majority of whom to-day are against this measure, to undo that which is thus accomplished.

I think, Mr. President, this is an entire abandonment of the doctrine of this country that the Government shall be fashioned according to the will and pleasure of the people. That was the original theory and doctrine; that the powers of government should be conferred upon the States and upon the General Government, and distributed among the several departments, according to the will of the people as expressed through their constitutions, and that constitutions have force and power and dignity because they express the great will of the people; but now the doctrine is that we have a right to take the people at a disadvantage; that because you professed to them last year that it was their right in their States to regulate this question, and thereby obtained from them a majority of the Legislatures, it is your right hastily to pass this business through the Congress and send it down to the States and fasten it upon the people before their voice can be heard upon it. That is the precise attitude of the question in the Senate at this hour, and that is the precise argument upon which it is claimed that this report of the committee must be carried through; not that it is right; not that the Presiding Officer of this body believes it is as it should be; not that my colleague believes it is as it should be; not even that the chairman of the committee of conference believes that it is as it should be; but it is in such a shape as you can pass it; you can take half a loaf from the people; you can force it through the State Legislatures and accomplish a political result not having the judgment and approval of two thirds here, and not having the approval of the people of the country. That is the argument that is addressed to the majority. It has been some time since I was in a majority, but I never did have an argument addressed to me of that sort when I was a part of the majority. If I should ever be with the majority I shall never expect that argument to be received by myself. When I am told that my party must exercise its power now or the people will defeat their desire I shall not respond to that appeal. I shall say that if it is the pleasure of the people to have a form of government somewhat different from my judgment it is their matter; it is my matter so far as I constitute a part of the body of the people; beyond that I have no power over it.

In this body I represent the people of the State of Indiana and the State as a member of this Confederacy. I have no will of my own to express on this subject, no ambitious schemes to favor, no ends to accomplish, except upon this and all other grave questions by my vote and by my voice to express the sentiment of the people of the State I represent. I expect to do that. I expect to do it whenever I occupy toward the people a representative position. I have no other duty to perform than to reflect their sentiments, and when I cannot conscientiously carry out the wish of the people, then upon so grave a question as the change of the form of the Government I would resign such representative position.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Indiana whether it might not be within possibility that he would admit that the result of the last election in Indiana indicated that he is not representing the sentiments of the people of Indiana at this time in the course that he takes on this amendment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the election in the State of Indiana last fall was tolerably well understood by me, I believe; at least its result was understood. [Laughter.] Now, I will answer the Senator from Missouri. His party said to the people of Indiana that when Mr. HENDRICKS or any other Democrat in the State told them that it was the purpose of their party to carry out negro equality it was a slander; that that was not their doctrine; and Mr. President you told them that in a document of the greatest dignity that your party could produce—the national platform. In that you said to the people of Indiana, "The right properly belongs to you to say who shall vote and hold office in that State." Upon that platform you went before the people of Indiana and satisfied a great many of them that they ought not to credit the suspicions expressed by Democrats of your integrity in that declaration. I did not believe very much in it. I believed that I understood what was the ultimate purpose; but the plain and unsophisticated people of the country, that had perhaps not seen quite so much of political movements and machinery, did believe you, and they thought that in fact you intended to leave to the people of the States the regulation of suffrage and the right of holding office. You said to the people one thing, and then after you got the majority of Congress and the Legislatures you propose to do another thing. That would be defined not as the highest act of honesty in ordinary commercial transactions.

Mr. President, in further response to the Senator from Missouri I will say that, in my judgment, if he submits this question to the people of Indiana, the plain question to take from that State the control of suffrage and the control of the right to hold office, he will lose it by a very large vote, a much larger vote than has ever been given to any political party in that State.

Mr. DRAKE. Then I would suggest that the Senator will have great occasion to be thankful for a result of that kind. It will probably return to us the eloquent and graceful Senator from Indiana at some future day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If I should allow political considerations to influence my judgment I might desire that you should force this thing. But, Mr. President, I desire that in changing the Constitution of the United States the Senate should stand by the sentiments of the Government itself, and that the popular will shall still control in regard to the great question of the form of government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour for taking a recess having arrived, the Senate will take a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

ZELICA T. DUNLAP.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask leave to report, from the Committee on Pensions, a bill (S. No. 977) granting a pension to Mrs. Zelica T. Dunlap, which was accidentally overlooked when the other bills were reported. I should like to have it read and put it on its passage at once.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 977) granting a pension to Zelica T. Dunlap was read three times, and passed. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Zelica T. Dunlap, widow of James E. Dunlap, late a lieutenant colonel of the twenty-ninth regiment of Illinois volunteers, and allow and pay her a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month, to commence from the 12th of May, 1863, and to continue during her widowhood.

Guthrie, children of Presley N. Guthrie, late a captain in the United States Army, and pay them a pension of twenty dollars per month, commencing May 2, 1867.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment to the bill, which was to insert after the word "them," in the eighth line, the words "or their authorized guardian or guardians," and at the end of the bill to insert:

And continuing until November 11, 1868, and afterward to the said Robert or his guardian or guardians until October 23, 1871, when he will attain the age of sixteen years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. DAVIS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 596.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the eighteenth regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war of 1861, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, deceased, a private in the eighteenth regiment of the Indiana volunteers of the war of 1861, and that she be paid a pension allowed a private during her widowhood, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to commence on the 1st day of —, 186—; and in case of her death or marriage then the pension to be paid to the minor children of William P. Davis, deceased, under sixteen years of age, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment to the bill, to strike out in line ten the word "first" and insert "ninth;" and to fill the first blank with "September," and the second blank with the word "one," so as to read: "commence on the 9th day of September, 1861."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN CARSON.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1821.

No. 1903) granting a pension to Charles Mains, of Tennessee; which directs the Secretary of the Interior to inscribe on the pension-rolls the name of Charles Mains, of Johnson county, Tennessee, and that he be paid at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 1st of November, 1868.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLOTTE WEBSTER.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1917.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1917) granting a pension to Charlotte Webster, widow of Timothy Webster, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charlotte Webster, widow of Timothy Webster, deceased, who was in the secret service of the United States, arrested by the rebels, and executed at Richmond on the 13th of April, 1862, and that she be paid out of the pension fund during her widowhood the sum of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 13th of April, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. JOHNSON.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1918.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1918) to increase the pension of William H. Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension heretofore granted to William H.

Johnson, late a private in the United States Navy, from three dollars and fifty cents to eight dollars per month, and that he be paid at that rate, to commence on the 1st of July, 1868, and it directs the Secretary of the Interior to have it so entered in the Department, to be subject, in all respects, to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws passed in relation to soldiers of the late war to put down the rebellion, known as the war of 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDMUND W. WANDELL.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1919.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1919) granting a pension to Edmund W. Wandell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble to the bill recites that Edmund W. Wandell entered as a private in company I, first regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, in the war with Mexico, and served to the close of that war in 1848, when he received an honorable discharge; that owing to disease contracted in the service his name in the year 1854 was placed upon the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month; that in November, 1862, he raised a company and was commissioned as captain of company G of the one hundred and forty-third regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, in the war of 1861; that on the 7th of November, 1863, he was honorably discharged for disability contracted in the Mexican war, and on application his pension was restored, but only from February, 1868, instead of from date of his discharge. The bill therefore proposes to make the sixth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act relating to pensions," approved July 27, 1868, applicable to his case.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Baker, of Marion county, Illinois, formerly a private in company I, fourth regiment Indiana volunteers, in the war with Mexico, to receive a pension from the approval of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR EXPENSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Messrs. SUMNER, FRELINGHUYSEN, and WYTT the further committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the constitutional amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to appeal to the Senator from Nevada to allow me to pass a small bill that I have been trying to bring before the Senate for a week past.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to pass three or four bills.

Mr. DRAKE. I want to pass one.

Mr. POMEROY. When this evening was set apart for pension bills I thought it was understood that I should have a part of the evening for business from the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee of conference on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is before the Senate, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Indiana will consent, I desire to submit a question to the Chair before he begins.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. POMEROY. With the consent of the Senator from Indiana I desire to submit a question of order. I discussed to some extent this morning the question, but did not make any point of order, because I wanted to satisfy myself further that it was really a question of order. I thought in the morning during this discussion that the point might be reached without making it a question of order, but the question of order I now submit is in these words:

The conference committee appointed to confer and report upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the joint resolution of the Senate No. 8, have reported upon the agreeing votes as well as the disagreeing, in that they strike out the words 'to hold office,' which was not submitted to them.

The point of order which I make is that the committee to whom was referred the disagreeing votes have reported upon the agreeing votes, and they were words not essential to that portion of the amendment that the House receded from; in that they have made to the Senate a report upon what was not committed, and hence under the rules of the Senate it cannot be received. I do not care to argue the point.

Mr. NYE. I hope we shall not fool away an hour now on a question of order.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not care to argue the point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. POMEROY. It is a question of order that must be decided by the Chair without debate.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from Kansas whether he intends to impale the rights of man upon a point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no debate allowed on this subject. We are admonished by the rules that committees of conference are only to settle such matters as the two Houses of Congress have not agreed upon, but I do not think it is such a question of order that the court can direct a non-suit on. [Laughter.] It appears to me to be so connected with the case that it must be submitted to the judgment of the Senate, and the Chair could hardly rule out the report under such circumstances.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not care to appeal from the court in this matter, but I want the point of order noted in the proceedings because no case of this kind has gone unchallenged, and the Senate invariably, where the text of a bill has been interfered with by a conference report, has required it to be passed by a unanimous vote.

Mr. STEWART. I simply want it noted that the point of order is more false in fact than in theory.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator appeals from the decision of the Chair that is one thing. It is debatable then, but not without.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no appeal.

["Question!" "Question!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor on the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference; and as it takes two thirds to decide that question the roll must be called.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not intend to trespass on the time of the Senate, but I wish to say one word. I have already stated my views on this subject generally; but the amendment as it is now presented entirely ignores the great principle of human rights. There is nothing protective in this amendment except in regard to color, race, or previous condition of slavery. The principle of the Declaration of Independence is entirely ignored. It is not an amendment that gives manhood suffrage at all. That part of the subject I do not wish to say anything about; I have already expressed my views.

The right of suffrage is a greater right than the right of holding office for this reason: the principle laid down in the Declaration of Independence is that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Of course the right to hold office must be an inferior right to that of voting, because it is not supposed that men who have the right to consent to the Government are going to consent to a Government which would debar them from the right to hold office.

Again, I think the Constitution as it stands at present would guaranty to each citizen of the United States the right to hold office if he were elected. I do not doubt on that point myself. A proposition is made here to incorporate this principle in the Constitution, and an amendment has been made to it which takes out the principle from this amendment, thus placing a construction upon the Constitution which denies the right of the citizen to hold office. Now, if this amendment is made to the Constitution as it stands it will deny to those citizens specified in the amendment the right to hold office. That is the clear and inevitable construction of it. That of course defeats the rights which the citizen holds under the Constitution as it stands at the present time.

Mr. POMEROY. In order that I may vote intelligently I want to ask the Chair a question. When this vote is taken, if the Senate do not concur in the report of the committee of conference, will it be in order for me to move that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendments to our resolution and agree to the same? If we vote to disagree and non-concur with this report of the committee, or if the motion to concur be not carried by a two-thirds vote, then I want to ask the Chair whether it will be in order for me to move to recede from our disagreement with the House and agree to the House amendments to our resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is anticipating a difficulty that may be a real one when it occurs; but it has not yet arisen.

Mr. POMEROY. An answer to the question will help me in voting. I do not know how to vote until I know the decision of the Chair on that point.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose the gentleman knows all about parliamentary law and he does not want any instruction. We are not going to turn the Senate into a school to instruct the Senator from Kansas in parliamentary law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. My impression is that if the Senate refuses to concur that is a disagreement to the report, on which a further conference may then be asked. I do not think anything further can be done.

Mr. POMEROY. The Chair holds then that a motion—

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a question of order, sir. There can be no question such as the Senator raises put to the Senate. The Chair has ordered the roll to be called. The question raised by the Senator is predicated upon what may transpire hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very true. The question has not arisen.

Mr. POMEROY. I was asking the question for the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. CONNESS. It is a wrong time for that. Let us vote.

Mr. POMEROY. I am to judge myself whether it is the wrong time or the right time.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There cannot be more than one question of order at a time.

Mr. POMEROY. I was not suggesting any question of order. I was asking the Chair whether I could at a given time make a motion and have it in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. You can make the motion; but the question would be whether it would be in order when it was made? The opinion of the Chair now is, unadvised, that it would not be in order to make that motion at that stage of the proceedings, and that the regular way would be, if the Senate should non-concur, which in the opinion of the Chair would be equivalent to a disagreement, to ask for a further conference. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, before this question is put to a vote I propose to submit a few observations which seem to me to be timely.

In the first place I have to observe that what I supposed would occur from the appointment of the committee of conference has actually taken place. I was of opinion, and expressed that opinion, that sooner or later the Senate would be brought to the point of agreeing to some House proposition; that all the effort expended in this body in shaping a proposed amendment to the Constitution would be lost, would go for nothing; that the House of Representatives would have its own way; that some proposition formed by it would be accepted; and I went on to observe that this would be in accordance with the proceedings of Congress for the last half dozen years on subjects of this description—I mean on political questions, or those having a political complexion.

I am not therefore surprised when the committee of conference bring back to us the original House amendment, if not in exact terms, in substance. It is precisely the amendment which the House passed originally and sent here, and which the Senate attempted to amend, in which attempt a very large amount of time was expended, and a good deal of effort also, including the holding of a protracted night session. The acceptance of this report of the committee of conference thus will be consistent with congressional history and action for many years, during which the Senate has usually given way to the House.

Another point of more importance: it is my opinion, and I take this occasion to express it, that the amending power of the Constitution does not authorize this change. It is my idea that the amendment clause has some limitations, the leading and principal one of which being that an amendment must be within the scope and purpose of the original instrument. It must be in pursuance of the objects for which the Constitution was formed; within the general scope and purpose for which it was made. I believe that you may submit an amendment to the Constitution to the several States changing the qualifications of voters who choose members of Congress and electors of President and Vice President of the United States, or regulating the manner in which these Federal officers or officials shall be chosen. An amendment with either of these objects would be within the general purposes of the original delegations of power to the Government of the United States, or rather within those general objects for which the Government of the United States was established. But this amendment goes further. It proposes to establish a rule of suffrage for State purposes, one which will obtain at State elections and give direction to the political institutions and political action of the several States.

Now, sir, consider: if a provision looking to that object had been put into the Constitution originally no one can doubt that the Constitution would have been rejected; it would not have been ratified by nine States; it would not have gone into operation; it would never have had legal existence as the fundamental law of the land. For the States with the ideas that then obtained would not have surrendered up to this Government which they were forming control over their local institutions. Above all they would not have permitted this Government, or three fourths of their co-States, to have regulated State suffrage in any way whatever, to have prescribed the qualifications which should obtain for an exercise of that right.

If by virtue of this power of amendment which is in the Constitution you can propose and adopt an amendment which shall have the effect of prescribing the rule of suffrage for State purposes what, have you done? You have put the institutions of the State, their home institutions, their domestic policy, their local frames of government, their sovereignty, and their powers altogether within the control of three fourths of the other States.

Mr. Madison, in certain numbers of the Federalist, proceeded in a masterly manner to portray our compound system of government. He stated, and he stated truly, that our system was compounded of two great elements, the one national and the other State; that the two principles, the one of State power and of State sovereignty for certain purposes, and the other of national power for common purposes, both of defense and of internal polity, enter into the constitution of this Federal Government and were recognized by it. He argued at length and with great power that the maintenance of both these principles was absolutely necessary to the existence of free and successful government in this country. I but allude to those essays of his as containing in a more full and ample manner than it is convenient for me to state the ideas upon which this opinion which I have now expressed is founded, that no State ever surrendered up to three fourths of its co-States a power by way of amending the Constitution to revolutionize and change the State frame of governments in the vital, the most important particular possible—the right of suffrage; in other words, never surrendered up to its co-States the power to say who should constitute the State. That is the point struck at by this amendment.

What is a State in the true sense of the term? It is not the government of the State. Government is but a representative under our system. The State is composed of the people of the State; and when you come to define that term "people" in its political sense, under our institutions it means the electors of the State, for with them is lodged the sovereign power of the State, and they participate in the possession and enjoyment of that power with no other community or power under heaven. The electors of the State, then, constitute the State; with them is lodged its sovereignty, and, as I think, the State government and the Federal Government are simply agents exercising this sovereign power, because its exercise has been delegated to them. Now, what is the principle which underlies this amendment before you? It is that three fourths of the States, as distinct political communities, acting upon this question of amendment, may reach into a co-State and change that State; may decree that those who hold its sovereign powers shall hold them no longer, or that they shall participate in the enjoyment of those sovereign powers with others against their will. I insist that this is so clearly a departure from any of the general principles on which the Constitution was formed and this Federal Government established that it does not and cannot fall within the amending power of that Constitution. In taking this ground I do not argue against Federal power properly understood, nor does my conclusion weaken any just principle or argument in favor of efficiency and vigor in this Government, the common Government for all the States. I admit that by the amending power you may provide who shall choose members of the lower House of Congress; you may provide who shall choose your presidential electors; you may provide that your electoral colleges shall be abolished and that your President shall be chosen in a different manner; you might provide, were it not for a particular clause of the Constitution, that the States should be represented in this body in a different manner from what they now are. It is only because there is a limitation in that respect that you cannot by amendment provide that the States shall be represented altogether in a different manner from what they now are.

I admit all legitimate consequences which are drawn from the insertion of the amending clause in the Constitution of the United States, that it may extend to any object or purpose for which this Government was made, or which is necessary to its efficient and successful operation as a common organ of all the States and of all the people of all the States.

But, sir, not only were the people indisposed originally when the Government was founded to grant any such power over local or State arrangements, and particularly over the sovereign powers of the State, the manner in which those powers should be bestowed and who should exercise them—not only did this jealousy exist originally against undue grants which should trench unnecessarily upon the sovereignty of the States, but every reason, every argument which originally, and during all the earlier periods of our history was produced upon the subject of the distribution of power between the States and the Federal Government tells in the same direction; and even if this amending power should be held to be, what it is not, a power to change a State and to make it something that it is not, it would be, upon every ground of legitimate argument, unwise to enter upon the exercise of such power.

Mr. President, I have but little to add. I hope when this amendment goes down to the States for their consideration, as I suppose it will, that upon this ground which I have mentioned, if upon no other, they will reject it: that a competent number of them will withhold from it that ratification which you invite. If they do so, they will so far as this question is concerned have maintained our system of governments as they were originally made and as it was intended that they should exist forever, or at least until in the course of ages some convulsion, some great change which should rock society to its foundations should subvert the entire structure which they had reared. If the States to whom you send this amendment shall stand forward and reject it, not merely upon the ground of policy, not merely upon the argument that it is doubtful in character or in result, but upon the ground that it is a fundamental, an injurious, an unauthorized departure from the fundamental principles of our system of government, they will have given a guarantee and a security to our institutions which will not fail us hereafter and will exercise a most salutary influence upon the proceedings of this government and upon the constitution of political parties throughout the country; for it will then have been determined upon good ground that there is a clear limit upon this power of amending the Federal Constitution, that there are some rights which it cannot touch or overthrow, that republicanism and republican institutions in this country are not altogether the sport or plaything of a mere majority nor of a three-fourths vote of the States of the Union, that even a minority of the States are secure in those rights which they have always hitherto enjoyed, and which it was intended when the Constitution was made should always be sacred from interference either by this Government or by their co-States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, but four working days now remain before this session of Congress will have reached its close. If we were to take up the bills upon the tables of the two Houses that are necessary or at least proper to be acted upon and barely read them, without debate, we should hardly be able to more than discharge our legitimate duties. From my knowledge of the state of business in each House I am prepared to believe that we must accept the report of this committee or abandon all hope of any amendment of the Constitution being proposed by this Congress.

I would much prefer some different amendment from this; and yet I am not prepared to say that this does not go as far as would be likely to prove acceptable to a majority of the people. I trust, therefore, that without further consumption of time, considering the vast amount of business that is yet remaining to be done, those of us who are in favor of accepting the best that we can obtain will proceed to vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I am inclined to support this amendment for two reasons, because in its present form it is not liable to the objection which constrained me to vote against the proposition which first passed the Senate, and because I apprehend that if recommitment to a committee of conference, either to the one which reported it or to a new one, it would come back to us burdened with other conditions which would make it much less acceptable.

I believe in negro suffrage. I voted for it when the question was submitted to the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent and in which it happily prevails. Not holding to such liberal views as some of the Senators on the question of suffrage, believing that it is not a natural right but a right derived from society and properly under the control of society, I do not think that color is one of its just limitations.

I felt no hesitation in supporting the reconstruction measures which required that the colored population should be consulted in the framing of the fundamental compact. There was no legal government in the insurrectionary States except military government. Both Houses of Congress had declared that those States were not entitled to be represented in Congress until they should form governments in harmony with the Constitution of the United States and acknowledging its authority, and till Congress should recognize such governments. When Congress came to inquire if the new governments were republican in form it was bound to examine the popular basis on which they rested; and it was right and convenient for Congress to state in advance what evidence it would accept as conclusive on that point. In this way it came that negro suffrage was the result of a rebellion undertaken to extend and perpetuate the enslavement of the negro race. I apprehend that there is no possible danger of their losing the rights which have thus been conferred upon them. The ballot has been given to them, and cannot be taken from them without their own consent. To doubt their ability to keep it is to doubt the wisdom of conferring it upon them.

But I confess a great reluctance to changes in the fundamental law. The amendment of the Constitution is one of the gravest matters which the instrument itself devolves upon Congress and upon the States. The guards which the fathers threw around it, the cautious and conservative provisions with which they protected it the respect which they showed for the rights of the minorities, all admonish us that if we would administer it in the spirit in which it was framed we should approach the subject of amendment deliberately, with ample time for consultation here, with opportunities for full and frank consultation by the States and by the people; that we should take no advantage of accidental majorities, but should secure to every proposition of amendment the fair and considerate judgment of the authorities to which the Constitution has confided the matter. But it seems plain that Congress has determined to submit to the States some proposition of amendment of the Constitution on the subject of suffrage; and this is the form of all those in which it has been presented, except the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] that strikes me as least objectionable. In voting for it I vote merely to present it to the States for their constitutional action, to ask the judgment of the States upon it, and I by no means thereby surrender my right of judgment upon its ratification when the discussion shall come up in the State with whose high commission I am honored in this Chamber.

I did not happen to be in my seat when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] alluded to the suffrage of Rhode Island. I had gone to the House of Representatives to consult with my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Printing on the part of the House, upon a matter that had been committed to the joint committee. I do not deem it incumbent upon me to make any defense of our right to make our own regulations for our own State. They suit us; I am sorry they do not please others; but they were not made for the people of Massachusetts, they were made for us, and whether right or wrong they suit us, and we intend to hold them; and we shall not ratify any amendment to the Constitution of the United States that contravenes them, and we have the satisfaction of knowing that without our State the necessary number of twenty-eight States cannot be obtained for the ratification of any amendment whatever until new elections take place. What opportunity there will then be for it other Senators can judge as well as I.

Mr. WILSON. "Little Rhody" takes the responsibility.

Mr. ANTHONY. She takes the responsibility of managing her own affairs in her own way, and she takes the responsibility of exercising her constitutional right, which in this Chamber and upon this subject is equal to the constitutional right of any other State in the Union. If that is a mistake it was a mistake which the fathers made, and the advantage of which we are not disposed to surrender. But if we fail to satisfy our friends in Massachusetts in our management of our internal affairs it must be a consolation to them that in the early colonial period they robbed our State of so large a part of the territory that rightfully belongs to us, thereby rescuing so much from the principles of soul liberty professed by Roger Williams and transferring it to the protection of those principles which drove him from the borders of Massachusetts and illustrated their practical operation in the proceedings against the Salem witchcraft.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask my honorable friend from Rhode Island one question. Does my honorable friend believe that it is right and proper that the State constitution and the State government of Rhode Island or Kentucky should be altered by the two Houses of Congress in direct opposition to the principles and wishes of those States respectively?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose that Congress has a right to submit this amendment to the States, and it is proper that it should be submitted in that form which is least objectionable. I vote to recede from that amendment which the House put upon our proposition, which makes it more objectionable to me. That is my vote.

Mr. DAVIS. My honorable friend has not answered my question. My question is, is it right and proper that the two Houses of Congress shall change the constitution and the government either of the State of Rhode Island or the State of Kentucky in opposition to the wishes and the will of their people?

Mr. ANTHONY. As that is a private matter between my friend from Kentucky and myself I will answer that question when the vote has been taken. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. That is sufficient, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. President, I suppose now of course the vote is to be taken upon this amendment. I do not expect to say anything that will affect or change the vote of any member of the Senate; but I think it due to those members of the body who are opposed to this proposition, and I think it due to the country, that it should be made known that this proposition now at last when it comes to be passed does not receive the sanction in fact of two thirds of the Senate. I think it legitimate and proper that the country should know that Senators rise here in their places and say that they do not approve of this proposition, say that they do not think for themselves and for their States that it ought to be passed, and yet from some pressure or for some purpose they vote for it and they submit it to the States for their ratification or their rejection.

Sir, if I were a Senator from one of the recently reconstructed States, as they are denominated here, and believed as those Senators do that the right to vote implied the right to be voted for, I would not vote for a proposition to amend the Constitution that did not include the right to hold office as well as the right to vote; but many of these Senators, while they think the proposition ought to go that far, and while they hesitate and are reluctant as they tell you, after having voted for a proposition like this, to go back to their constituents, not having urged the right to hold office as well, yet they are prepared to vote for this proposition. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] a few moments since explained why he might vote for this proposition; and what was his reason? Why, sir, because it does not run counter to the sentiments of the people of Rhode Island, because it does not trench upon the opinions of the people of Rhode Island upon the question of suffrage, he is willing to vote for it. If it interfered with their sentiments he would not support it we may infer from the fact that he voted against the proposition the other day.

So, sir, I want the country to know that the Senate of the United States agree to this report of a committee of conference on this subject where a two-thirds vote is required by the Constitution to submit it to the several States, when in point of fact two thirds of them do not approve of it and do not believe in it. The Senator from Rhode Island says that this is merely a proposal submitted to the States, and after that he reserves to himself the right to approve of it or not in his capacity as a citizen of the State of Rhode Island. The Constitution provides that "whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary" they shall propose amendments to the Constitution. Now, sir, I submit that in the exercise of this power of amendment under the Constitution every Senator when he votes for this proposition in his place says to his constituents and to the country that he believes in his heart and in his conscience that the amendment is necessary; that he believes that it subserves the interests of the General Government; that he believes in the discharge of his duties as a Senator that it is necessary that this amendment should be made, and thus believing he proposes to submit it to the States for their adoption or rejection.

So, Mr. President, it is not allowable for a Senator, in my judgment, to say that this is a proposition which the States may or may not adopt as they please. There is a higher, there is another responsibility, and that is that each Senator when he votes for this says in the discharge of his duties as a Senator that he believes it is necessary that this amendment to the Constitution should be made, and he says to the States that he believes they ought to adopt it.

But, Mr. President, I merely rose, as I said at the outset, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate, and, so far as I might, the attention of the country to the fact that this proposition, while it does not receive in point of fact the approval of two thirds of the Senate, is yet to be passed and submitted to the States; and this fact, as I said, is apparent from the expression of Senators upon the subject, from the views of Senators on the amendments that have been pending, and from the fact that they defeated the other day a proposition almost identical with this. If I have succeeded in calling the attention of the Senate and of the country to this fact I have done all that I care to do. This amendment is to pass, I have no doubt; it is to be submitted to the States. Party appliances, party machinery, and party discipline are to be brought to bear on the Legislatures now in existence in the several States to adopt it. It may be adopted, but when it is thus adopted by the States, and twenty-seven States compel all the thirty-six to accept this as their rule of suffrage in all their elections, from that day, in my judgment, you may date the downfall, the destruction of the rights of the States, and from that day you may date the consolidation, the centralization, of power in the Federal Government, and you may date the despotism of Congress.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word. I want respectfully but earnestly to enter my humble protest against the character of this amendment. While I shall probably vote for it in the shape it is, I shall do it rather in deference to the judgment of older and wiser men than myself than in accordance with my own deliberate judgment. I do not feel that it is worth our while to change the organic law of the country, to amend it for the protection of a single class, unless at least we protect that one class completely and entirely. I have no doubt that if Mississippi or Texas or Virginia were to come here with a constitution containing these exact words which we now propose to put into the Constitution of the United States she would not be admitted by this Senate. After the example of Georgia I do not believe that this Senate and this Congress would accept from one of these States a constitution containing these identical words upon the question of suffrage and the rights of the colored people. I believe that this proposition is a narrow and illogical one, and one that is unworthy of the grand opportunity that is presented to us. In my own humble judgment, I believe it is the duty of the hour to put into the Constitution a grand affirmative proposition which shall protect every citizen of this Republic in the enjoyment of political power. Not only do I believe that that is right and just, and the duty of the hour and the opportunity, but I believe it is the wisest thing we can do. I believe as a party measure the strongest proposition that could go before the country would be one to protect all classes of men, white as well as black, in the exercise of the rights which all citizens legitimately should carry with them.

So much I think it my duty to say in regard to the character of this amendment. Nor am I satisfied that it is the best provision we could get. My own judgment is that if the Senate were to stand firmly upon a broader proposition it would be adopted and go to the people, and would be adopted by the States. A proposition broader than this has been adopted by both Houses; we have also adopted a narrower one, and yet we have refused to adopt this one intermediate between the two. The other evening when I moved to concur in the House amendments to our resolution the Senate very promptly laid the whole matter on the table. I think we might yet reach a proposition which should at least protect one class perfectly in the enjoyment of their legal rights, if it were not broad enough to reach all classes of citizens in this country.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I suppose this report will be concurred in; but I presume it will require a two-thirds vote to carry it. I simply wish to say before the vote is taken that my understanding of the proposition as it now stands is that it decides by an amendment to the Constitution that the Constitution does not guaranty to all citizens of the United States the right to hold office. I understand it to be simply the assertion of that principle, which has been maintained in a number of the States, and that it sanctions and sanctifies the action of the Georgia Legislature which has kept out two Senators from this body during the present session; and that we arrive at this principle through the action of a gambling committee, which after the Senate and House of Representatives had adopted a more liberal and much better principle, shuffled the cards over again and gave us a new deal that will satisfy a certain number of gentlemen. The effect of it is to exclude from office a large number of the citizens of the southern States merely to gratify a prejudice that exists in certain of the northern States who wish to heap heavy burdens upon the shoulders of other men that they will not touch with their own fingers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee; and on this question the yeas and nays must be called.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 39, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Oranin, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Hendricks, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Vickers, and Whyte—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Corbett, Edmunds, Grimes, Henderson, Pomeroy, Ross, Salsburg, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, and Yates—14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 39, and the nays are 13. Two thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the report is agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair what the number of votes was announced to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas were 39, and the nays were 13; being two thirds.

Mr. DAVIS. The question of order that I make is that the decision of this question has not been announced by the Chair according to the Constitution. The Chair has announced that the proposition has received the vote of two thirds of the Senate, and therefore that it has passed. I controvert that fact. There are now thirty-seven States in the Union. They are entitled to seventy-four members of the Senate.

Mr. NYE. The honorable Senator will allow me to correct him. The Chair did not make the announcement that the honorable Senator says he did. He said it received two thirds of the votes of all the members present. That was the announcement by the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS. The Chair announced that the proposition had passed.

Mr. HOWARD. The Chair announced that the Senate had concurred in the report.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely want to state my point of order. I do not intend to consume any time upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires the Senator to understand what the Chair said in the announcement of the vote. It was that two thirds of the Senators present had voted in the affirmative. That is the way in which it was announced by the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS. But then the conclusion was—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the report was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. That is just as I understood it. Now, the conclusion does not follow the vote which the Chair announced, because the Senate consists of seventy-four members, and to constitute two thirds of the Senate a vote of fifty is necessary. My point of order is, that when a less number than two thirds of the Senate is required by the Constitution for any purpose, for instance to ratify a treaty or to confirm a nomination, the Constitution expressly says that it shall be two thirds of the members present. In voting upon a proposition to amend the Constitution, the Constitution does not limit the number of two thirds by reciting that it is two thirds of the members present. Here is the language of the Constitution:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary," &c.

Now, if Senators will look to that part of the Constitution which regulates the ratification of treaties by the Senate, or the confirmation of nominations to office by the President, they will perceive that the Constitution declares expressly that the two thirds meant to effect those purposes are two thirds of the members present. In relation to this important matter of amending the Constitution there is no such restricted definition of two thirds; but the Constitution in broad language provides that "Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary," &c., shall propose amendments of the Constitution. Now, the question is, what is two thirds of both Houses? What is two thirds of the Senate? Chuckle-heads may laugh; interlopers may laugh; but the proposition that I make is technically, logically, and constitutionally true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to a point of order. I believe I was recognized by the Chair. The Senator from Kentucky rose to a point of order, and he is making an extended argument; and I think I am entitled to proceed with my business. I have no objection to his stating the point of order; but proceeding to an extended argument after I am on the floor and recognized by the Chair, it seems to me is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Questions of order, by our rules, are not debatable.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not intend to interfere with the rights of the honorable Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was willing to give a reasonable time for the statement of the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I will yield to his resumption of his right. I think I have satisfied my State that the two thirds required by the Constitution to propose amendments to that instrument, from the annunciation of the vote of the Senate, has not been obtained in favor of this proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me on this question to call the attention of the Presiding Officer to the language of the Constitution in another article. The article of the Constitution controlling this question speaks of two thirds of the Senate. The Presiding Officer will observe in article one, section three, paragraph six, on the subject of impeachment, that it is provided that the Senate shall try the impeachment, "and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present." In one case the Constitution speaks of two thirds of the members present deciding the question; and in the other case the bill must have two thirds of the body. I wish also to call the attention of the Chair to the provision for the ratification of treaties.

Mr. HOWARD. While the Senator is looking at the Constitution, I wish to know what the question is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A question of order is raised.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I submit that it is not in order to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order is raised that the vote was not carried because there were not two thirds of the entire Senate in the affirmative, but only two thirds of the members present.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan, if he desires to look into the subject, to the second section—

Mr. HOWARD. It is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Questions of order are not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not desire to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has decided the question precisely as all these propositions for amendments have been heretofore decided. The exception probably has never been taken.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, this very point was raised in regard to a constitutional amendment some years ago, and the Senate decided by a vote, almost unanimously, that two thirds of the Senators present were sufficient to carry a constitutional amendment. I think that the Presiding Officer upon reflection will recollect it. It was the constitutional amendment that was proposed before the war. I myself made the point for the purpose of having it decided, and it was decided, I think by a nearly unanimous vote, that two thirds of the Senators present, a quorum being present, was sufficient to carry a constitutional amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if that vote did not show two thirds of the Senators of the States then represented in Congress?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir. The constitutional amendment to which I refer was proposed before the war, at the close of Mr. Buchanan's administration, when Breckinridge was the Presiding Officer of the Senate; and I myself raise the question whether two thirds of the Senate, there being a quorum present, could propose a constitutional amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment, which passed, was one that perhaps is foreign to this question, and the Senator from Vermont will not want to hear it at this time. It was a proposition to amend the Constitution so that never hereafter should slavery be abolished; and I am sorry to say it passed this body, not by my vote, however, at that time.

Mr. POMEROY. That was before the flood.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raised the question then—the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] recollects it—for the very purpose of having it decided.

Mr. ANTHONY. I recollect that the Senator raised the question, and I believe I asked him why he raised it, and he said he did it to settle the question that less than two thirds of all the Senators might propose a constitutional amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a decision on the question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe it has been decided according to all the precedents. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to take up House bill No. 1204. It will take but a minute to pass it, I think.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1204) to confirm certain private land claims in the State of Missouri. It provides that the claims of the legal representatives of Gabriel Cerre and Sophia Bolaye, falling within the exterior boundaries of the commons of Carondelet, the former entered as No. 60, for four hundred arpens, and the latter as No. 279, for one hundred and fifty arpens, in the first class of decisions of the board of land commissioners under the acts of Congress approved 9th July, 1832, and 2d March, 1833, for the adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, as recommended by the board, (House Ex. Doc. 59, first session Twenty-Fourth Congress, page 187, and Senate Doc. 16, same session, page 40,) which claims were confirmed by the act of Congress approved 4th July, 1836, subject to location elsewhere than in place in case of conflict, shall be confirmed in place, subject to any valid adverse rights, if such exist, and patents for the claims shall be issued accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OCEAN MAIL STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 186.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read by its title for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. No. 186) declaratory and amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for an American line of mail and immigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports," passed July 27, 1868.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very evident that that resolution, on account of its weight, will occupy some time, and I have been trying to get the floor to pass one or two House bills which I do not think will excite any debate, and I am quite sure that that resolution will.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have kindly yielded to such suggestions frequently before this, and the result is that this resolution has been postponed until the session and the Congress have almost expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. That proposition is so important that I do not think it can be acted upon to-night.

Mr. RAMSEY. I would yield any courtesy in the world to the Senator from Ohio; but we are within four or five days of the expiration of the Congress, and he cannot expect me to yield now. I prefer to have a vote on my motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say that I do not want any bill taken up to-night which is likely to extend over to-morrow. The Senate will remember that we have the Army appropriation bill still unfinished.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my friend from Maine that the bills I propose to call up are one in regard to bank returns, and another in regard to certified checks; and if they are objected to I shall not be able to press them to-night.

Mr. POMEROY. Those will have to be debated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to call up the Army appropriation bill, which is unfinished, so that it shall be the order of the day for to-morrow without being subjected to the necessity of struggling for the floor after the morning hour to-morrow. I wish to say now that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has just passed the House of Representatives, but not in season to reach here until to-morrow at twelve o'clock—too late, of course, for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations to-morrow; therefore it must go over until Monday. The Senate will perceive that they cannot afford to allow any bill to step in ahead of the consideration of the Army appropriation bill and the Post Office appropriation bill which I desire to bring up to-morrow. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Minnesota will not bring up any bill to-night that will be likely to be carried over until to-morrow.

Mr. RAMSEY. This resolution can be disposed of in a very short time, and it might as well be taken up and disposed of now as at any other time, I imagine. There will not be a day from this to the close of the session that the same kind of argument may not be used that the Senator uses now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There are at least three bills on this subject, I believe; one from the Post Office Committee, one from the Committee on Commerce, and I do not know but another from the Committee on Finance. It will be utterly impossible to have this joint resolution considered to-night without a very considerable debate. I hope, therefore, the motion of the Senator from Minnesota will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the joint resolution mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 21.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not. I desire to pass a little resolution, and I ask the Senator to allow the Army bill to be laid aside informally, so that it will not lose its place, to enable me to call up House resolution No. 211.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it can be laid aside informally so that it will be the order to-morrow I will consent to withdraw the motion to adjourn, but not otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Army bill can be laid aside informally and other bills taken up if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

HENRY S. GIBBONS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House resolution No. 211.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. Johns, Michigan, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to add the following proviso:

Provided, It shall be proven satisfactorily to the Postmaster General that funds belonging to the Post Office Department to the amount of $500 was stolen by burglars, and that said Gibbons was not guilty of neglect in the custody thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to offer an amendment to this bill. There are two other cases here just like this which were considered the other evening, but the Secretary could not lay his hand upon the report, the reading of which was called for. I am told by the chairman of the Post Office Committee that the papers are here now, and there will be no objection to the amendment. I hope the Senator from Michigan will make no objection to allowing them to be considered together. I offer them as an amendment. There is no impropriety in it, for they are just such cases as this exactly, and they may just as well go together as be acted upon separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator offer an amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; I offer the bill for the relief of Luther McNeal and Seth M. Gates as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to pass, and then he can call up the cases to which he refers, and I will help to pass them if they are as good cases as this one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to insert as additional sections the following:

And be it further resolved, That Luther McNeal be paid the sum of $175 46 for money and postage stamps belonging to the United States, and which were stolen from the post office at the town of Lancaster, Erie county, New York, while he was postmaster, and which sum he has paid to the Government on settlement with the Post Office Department as such postmaster, and that such sum be paid out of the Post Office fund by the Postmaster General upon the said McNeal making proof to his satisfaction that said money and stamps were stolen without any fault of said McNeal.

And be it further resolved, That in the settlement of the accounts of Seth M. Gates, postmaster at Warsaw, New York, with the Post Office Department, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow a credit to the said Seth M. Gates of $726 73, the amount in value of postage stamps belonging to the United States stolen from the post office on the 16th of July, 1867, while the said Gates was postmaster; Provided, That it shall satisfactorily appear to the Postmaster General that the said Gates was guilty of no negligence in the custody of the said stamps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading. The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the title was amended so as to read "A joint resolution for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, Luther McNeal, and Seth M. Gates."

GUARDIANS FOR INDIAN CHILDREN.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a joint resolution giving authority of law to appoint guardians for seven Indian children in my State so that they may draw their pension. There is no law at present allowing a guardian for an Indian child. The father of these children served in the war and was killed. They want their pension. I have a letter from the Second Auditor in which he says that there is no law for the appointment of a guardian, and therefore they cannot be paid. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and consider Senate joint resolution No. 165, which simply authorizes our courts to appoint guardians for these children.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 165) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to appoint guardians or trustees for minor Indian children who may be entitled to pensions or bounties under the existing laws. It recites that sundry Indians served in the Federal Army, some of whom died in the service and others leaving minor heirs; and that there is no provision of law for these minor Indians to obtain bounties, back pay, or other benefits to which their ancestor was entitled. It therefore proposes to empower the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to appoint guardians or trustees of any of said minors, and to take bond and security for the performance of such duties; and the guardian or trustee so appointed is to be authorized to collect from the Government all such back pay, bounties, or other rights to which the minors may be entitled, and to expend the same for their use and benefit.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the resolution with an amendment to add to it the following words:

With the consent and under the direction of any court of record of the United States or of any Territory having jurisdiction at the place where such minors may reside.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I move further to amend the joint resolution in line eight by striking out the words "other rights" and inserting the word "pensions." It means pensions, and I wish to have that word inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to consider House bill No. 1881. It was a bill that was called up the other day, and objected to for the moment, in regard to the returns of banks. It is a public measure which ought to be passed at once.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Senator wishes to proceed with it by unanimous consent, so as not to displace the Army bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not propose to displace the Army bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending reported by the Committee on Finance, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in lieu of all reports required by section thirty-four of the national currency act every association shall make to the Comptroller of the Currency not less than five reports during each and every year, according to the form which may be prescribed by him, verified by the oath or affirmation of the president or cashier of such association and attested by the signature of at least three of the directors; which report shall exhibit in detail and under appropriate heads the resources and liabilities of the association at the close of business on any past day to be by him specified, and shall transmit such report to the Comptroller within five days after the receipt of a request or requisition therefor from him; and the report of each association, in the same form in which it is made to the Comptroller, shall be published in a newspaper published in the place where such association is established, or if there be no newspaper in the place, then in the one published nearest thereto in the same county, at the expense of the association; and such proof of publication shall be furnished as may be required by the Comptroller. And the Comptroller shall have power to call for special reports from any particular association whenever in his judgment the same shall be necessary in order to a full and complete knowledge of its condition: Any association failing to make and transmit any such report shall be subject to a penalty of $100 for each day after five days that such bank shall delay to make and transmit any report as aforesaid and in case any association shall delay or refuse to pay the penalty herein imposed, when the same shall be assessed by the Comptroller of the Currency, the amount of such penalty may be retained by the Treasurer of the United States, upon the order of the Comptroller of the Currency, out of the interest, as it may become due to the association, on the bonds deposited with him to secure circulation; and all sums of money collected for penalties under this section shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CORBETT. Was there not an amendment offered to that amendment by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the pending amendment was the one reported by the committee.

Mr. CATTELL. The Senator from Iowa offered no amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. He talked about one; but I believe he did not propose any.

Mr. CORBETT. He proposed to offer an amendment, and he spoke to me about it and asked me, if he was not here when the bill should be called up again, to modify it so as to require reports three times a year instead of five, in addition to the regular reports.

The CHIEF CLERK. When the bill was last under consideration it was proposed to amend the amendment in the first line by striking out the words "lieu of" and to insert "addition to;" so as to read "that in addition to all reports required by section thirty-four," &c.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to modify that amendment so as to require three instead of five reports in addition.

Mr. CATTELL. I trust the amendment offered to the amendment of the committee will not prevail; and I will take just two minutes to make a plain statement of this case. As the law at present stands the banks are required to make four quarterly statements upon given days in the year. They are advertised of the time when these statements are to be made, and consequently can make their arrangements so as to make favorable statements and not give the actual running condition of the banks. Besides, these quarterly statements create a contraction and expansion of currency at four different periods of the year and produce an evil. The amendment of the Committee on Finance provides that the Comptroller of the Currency instead of four reports, as now, shall call for five, on the condition of the bank upon a day past, which will enable him to get the actual running condition of the bank. It further provides that in cases where he deems it necessary he may call for reports from the banks more frequently than five times per annum. This alteration in the law has been recommended by the Comptroller of the Currency in two successive annual reports; and I hold in my hand a letter from him addressed to the chairman of the Finance Committee to-day, in which he calls attention to this bill, and says:

"This is a measure of great public importance, and I hope, if nothing else passes relative to national banks, this bill may succeed."

He approves it in this form. It was submitted to him, and in his judgment it is the wisest and best method of asking for the reports from the national banks.

Mr. CORBETT. I understand that this is to do away with the quarterly reports entirely.

Mr. SHERMAN. It substitutes five instead of four reports.

Mr. CORBETT. It seems to me that quarterly reports are very necessary in order that we may know at certain periods the condition of the banks. We should give an opportunity to the Comptroller to require additional reports at any time he may see fit—say three times a year. I think that would not be unreasonable. These regular reports are necessary. I think the suggestion was made by the Senator from Iowa the other day, and very properly, that under this proposition corruption might creep into the office under some other Comptroller; that if we should happen to get a Comptroller who desired to favor particular banks he might inform them at what time he would call upon them for a report, and in that way they might be specially favored in that respect. I have no particular feeling about this matter myself; but it was requested by the Senator from Iowa, in case he was not present when this bill was called up again, to modify his amendment in that way so as to make it three times additional; and I do not think it unreasonable. I believe it to be a very good suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CERTIFYING CHECKS BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have another bill from the House in reference to certifying checks by national banks. I ask that that be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1973) in reference to certifying checks by national banks.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment to strike out in lines eight, nine, ten, and eleven the words:

And it shall be the duty of the officers of any national bank certifying any check to enter the same to the account against which it is drawn as if the amount of such check had been paid in money.

And to insert in lieu thereof the words:

And any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to hear the bill read as it stands amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national bank to certify any check drawn upon said bank unless the person or company drawing said check shall have on deposit in said bank at the time such check is certified an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check; and any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank; and any officer, clerk, or agent of any national bank violating the provisions of this act shall subject such bank to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller as provided for in section fifty of the national banking law, approved June 3, 1864.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. NYE. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 797. It is the bill regulating the police of this city.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose it is understood that all this business is done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is all done by common consent. The title of the bill proposed to be taken up will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 797) to amend and consolidate the several acts establishing and relating to a Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is rather heavy for to-night. I object.

Mr. NYE. Let it be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside.

BLANTON DUNCAN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 953.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 953) for the relief of Blanton Duncan was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I presume it is not necessary to read the original bill. I send to the desk the substitute reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the property other than money of Blanton Duncan, of the State of Kentucky, now in the possession of the district court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, under proceedings instituted against him and his property under the act of July 17, 1862, for the confiscation of said property, be restored to the said Duncan, and the officers of the United States who may have the possession of such property are required to deliver the same to said Duncan.

Mr. NYE. It seems to me that is a pretty heavy bill for so late a time at night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to take it up and then we will discover how weighty it is.

Mr. NYE. The honorable Senator said that about the police bill. The object of that bill was to keep thieves from confiscating property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What committee does this bill come from?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on the Judiciary have considered it. If Senators wish to know what this case is I will state it. During the war the property of Mr. Duncan, in Louisville, was ordered by the court to be confiscated. The marshal of Kentucky took possession of it and received the rents upon it. There was a considerable amount of property. There was no sale of the property, and Mr. Duncan received a pardon, under which, as a matter of course, his property goes back to him. There will be no sale after he has been pardoned. This bill as modified directs the marshal to give him possession of the property but not of the rents. The change in the amendment from the original bill is in regard to the rents, leaving that under the control of the court inasmuch as the rents were received.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should suppose his property belonged to him without any bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought so, too, but it seems not. He cannot get possession of it, and he is in a starving condition.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the passage of that bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Hendricks, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Sawyer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Wiley, and Williams—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, and Patterson of New Hampshire—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Warner, Welch, Whyte, Wilson, and Yates—32.

So the bill was passed.

HOT SPRINGS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. RICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up House bill No. 1276.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation, in Arkansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That upon the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be surveyed, platted, and laid out into streets, blocks, and lots, or parcels of ground, of such form and area as will best facilitate the construction of a town, all that portion of the public domain described as follows, to wit: The south half of sections twenty-eight and twenty-nine; all of sections thirty-one and thirty-two, township two south, range nineteen west; and north half of sections four and five, township three south, nineteen west; in all four sections, known as the Hot Springs reservation, in Hot Springs county, State of Arkansas; Provided, That no parcel of ground surveyed and platted for lot, block, or street shall approach nearer than one hundred feet to any spring included in the group of hot or warm springs embraced within the aforesaid reservation. When the survey shall have been made, in accordance with the provisions herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause maps and plats to be made of said survey and the ground embraced within said reservation; said maps and plats shall show each lot, block, and street of said survey, each stream of water, and the elevation of each block of ground above some fixed point to be designated on a level with the drainage of said reservation, each spring and its elevation above the point designated, also the temperature of each spring, and shall furnish said maps and plats to persons who may apply for information: And provided further, That the circuit court in and for the eastern district of Arkansas shall have original jurisdiction of all claims and disputes and controversies existing or arising relating to the title to said reservation, or any part thereof; and that the United States, in all controversies, suits, and proceedings relative to said reservation, shall appear and be represented by the Attorney General of the United States, or the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Arkansas, or such other attorney as the Attorney General may employ, and shall be subject to the same rules, practice, principles, judgments, and decrees as a natural person party to said action. Any person claiming any right, title, or interest in or to said reservation, or any part thereof, may bring his suit in equity in said court at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, making the United States, and any other parties claiming adversely, parties to said action; and thereupon the same pleadings and proceedings shall be had, (the service of the subpoena upon the Attorney General by delivery to him of an attested copy of the same being sufficient notice to the United States); and the said court shall hear, try, and determine said cause according to the rules and practice of the circuit court aforesaid in equity cases. All parties to said action shall plead, answer, or demur within thirty days after service of subpoena; and in case of failure so to do the bill shall be taken as confessed. And within twenty days after the time for answering or demurring has expired a master in chancery shall be appointed by the judge of said court to take testimony in said cause, and all testimony shall be submitted to said master within ninety days after his appointment; and immediately thereafter the said master shall file his report with the clerk of the said court, and thereupon said cause shall take precedence for trial over all other cases on the docket, and a final judgment and decree shall be entered therein during the first regular term of the court thereafter, or at a special term of said court held after the filing of said report, and before a regular term, which the judge of said court is hereby authorized to order and hold for the purpose of more speedily determining said controversy, which judgment and decree shall be binding and conclusive upon the United States, as well as upon all other parties, any party to said action having the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States if taken within thirty days after said decree; and if said appeal is not perfected within said thirty days, it shall be null and void and of no effect; and thereupon the judgment of said circuit court shall be final. And on the trial of said cause it shall be competent for any of the parties to said action to submit in evidence exemplified copies of the records of any or all proceedings heretofore had, including the evidence given in any of the State or United States courts, in which the title to said reservation has been the subject of such proceedings, and such exemplifications so submitted shall form a part of the evidence to be considered in the determination of said cause. And in case of an appeal to the Supreme Court by any party to said action, the same shall take precedence on the calendar of said court of all other causes, and shall be called, heard, and determined by said court in its said order at the first term of said court held thereafter, or that may be in session at the date of perfecting said appeal. And the same proceedings, orders, and decrees shall be had thereon as is provided by the rules and practice of said court in equity cases; and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause land patents to be issued for any portion of said reservation to which any party or parties to said action may be entitled in accordance with the final judgment and decree of the court entered in said cause; and should said court determine that the title to said reservation, or any part thereof, is in the United States, then and in that case only said reservation, or so much thereof as may be by said court adjudged and decreed to belong to the United States, shall be sold as is provided herein: Provided further, That all persons failing to prosecute their claims to said land, or part thereof, in the manner and within the time above provided, shall be forever debarred of the right of instituting or maintaining any action or suit in any court for the recovery of the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within sixty days after said reservation is surveyed and platted, as above provided, appoint three disinterested freeholders, who shall appraise the said lots or parcels of ground so platted and surveyed, each at the cash value thereof, and return the same to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That after such surveys have been made, plats and maps prepared, and report of appraisers returned as provided, and after final decision by the court, the Secretary of the Interior shall advertise in one newspaper authorized to publish the laws of the United States in each State once each week for the period of sixty days; that upon a day to be designated in the advertisement, which shall be immediately succeeding the expiration of the period above named, the proper officers will sell upon the reservation, at public auction, to the highest and best bidder, all those lots or parcels of ground above described. Upon the day designated in the advertisement the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the sale to be made as provided, in accordance with existing laws made and provided for the sale of public lands: Provided, That no lot or parcel of ground shall be sold for less than its appraised value: Provided also, That no lot, block, or parcel of ground containing a spring of the character described as aforesaid, in section one, shall be sold or offered for sale; but said lot, block, or parcel of ground shall forever remain the property of the United States, subject to the control and authority of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to protect the said property from the occupation of any person or persons whatever, and keep it at all times open and free to the use of the public; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall report annually to Congress the situation of the said lot or block or parcel of ground, and what legislation may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The Secretary of the Interior shall have surveyed and set apart a plat of ground, not to exceed one hundred acres in area, upon what is known as Hot Springs mountain, for a public park, which may be excepted from the survey into lots, blocks, and streets, the title of which shall vest in like manner as the title of the springs hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the proceeds of the sale provided for in the foregoing sections of this act shall be returned to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall first pay all costs of survey, appraisal, and sale; after which he shall invest the residue in United States securities and hold it in trust until otherwise directed by law.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the interest accruing upon said securities shall be applied pro rata for the education of all the children in the State of Arkansas which may be between the ages of six and twenty years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF RULES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce the committee provided for by the resolution to amend the rules of the Senate. The committee will consist of Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. POMEROY, and Mr. EDMUNDS.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 812) to allow deputy collectors of internal revenue acting as collectors the pay of collectors, and for other purposes, and the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. BUCKALEW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to the Senate a statement, if any has been filed, of the account of internal revenue stamps issued by the Government since the passage of the act approved July 1, 1862, with the amounts received therefor, and a statement of the adjustment of such account by the Comptroller, if any has been made; with any explanation of such account as may be necessary to a proper understanding of its present condition.

PECOS AND PLACER DITCH COMPANY.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill relating to a canal or a ditch in New Mexico. The bill has been before the Senate the whole of this Congress and was reported in the fore part of the Congress, and there is a substitute reported by the committee. It relates to the irrigation of a little tract of land in New Mexico. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] drew the amendment, which I think is very carefully drawn, because it confines the sale of all the lands they irrigate to actual settlers at $2 50 an acre. They say they can irrigate it and sell it to actual settlers at $2 60 an acre, whereas now it is not worth a cent. It is Senate bill No. 287, granting the right of way and lands to the Pecos and Placer Ditch and Mining Company of New Mexico.

Mr. CONNESS. I am inclined to think that that bill had better not be considered to-night. All bills that propose to give the possession of water in countries as dry and arid as New Mexico had better be carefully considered. It is almost too late to-night to take up a bill of this kind.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow me to call up a bill that was reported from his committee this morning.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from California objects of course I cannot press the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I should have to object to that.

Mr. POMEROY. I know that nothing can be done except by unanimous consent. Objection being made, of course I cannot insist on the motion.

STURGEON BAY SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 707, extending the time for the completion of the Sturgeon Bay canal, reported this morning by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be taken up if there be no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think that bill has been returned from the printer.

Mr. COLE. That bill was only reported this morning; and I have been trying for some time to call up a bill which has been up once or twice before and can be passed in a few moments.

Mr. HOWE. If you object of course I cannot press it.

Mr. COLE. You will object to mine, I suppose, if I object to yours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that bill has been sent to the printer and has not yet been returned.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON VESSELS.

Mr. COLE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration and completion Senate bill No. 247, which has been twice up and been crowded off. It will take but a little while. It is to secure the safety of passengers traveling on vessels.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Oh, no. We cannot pass that to-night.

Mr. COLE. There is no objection to it. It will save hundreds of lives. If we had passed it at the last session it would have saved hundreds if not thousands of lives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate must be aware that the Chief Clerk has had a pretty heavy day's work and is wearied out by this time.

Mr. COLE. I appeal to the humanity of Senators to allow this bill to be taken up. I am sure they cannot object to it. It is to save human life. It will take but a few moments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on an amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE.]

Mr. CORBETT. I call for the reading of the amendment. If I remember it aright, it designates a particular kind of patent, which I think is improper to be added to this bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That every vessel carrying passengers shall supply each of her state-rooms or one half of the borths in each state-room with Golding's cork mattress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know anything about the merits of that proposition, nor would I undertake to discuss it; but I recollect that the other evening the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] took a very decided interest in favor of the proposition, and argued that the safety of passengers would be very considerably promoted by its adoption. I submit to Senators whether we ought to vote it down when he is not in his seat. I do not suppose that he thought a bill of such great importance would be brought up to-night.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He was here a moment ago.

Mr. CORBETT. I will state that I have examined these mattresses since the amendment was offered. I discover that they will probably have to take up about eighteen inches more room and will have to raise the decks of vessels in order to accommodate one of these mattresses. It is very hard and rounding, and it will require a mattress two or three times as thick as one on the ordinary flats. This bill provides for life-boats and rafts and other life apparatus for the general safety; and this mattress can be adopted under that provision if it is deemed proper to do so by the board. If the inspectors desire they can substitute this mattress. There is nothing to prevent them from doing so. This is a general provision. I think it is improper in such a bill as this to designate a particular mattress. They have had this mattress on exhibition in the room of the Committee on Commerce in the House and they declined, as I understand, to embrace it in the bill there.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCREERY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

Mr. COLE. I hope my friend from Kentucky will not insist on any other amendment to this bill. It comprises now two simple subjects, life-boats and rafts. One has a tendency to make the vessel itself a life-preserver and the other provides for the safety of the passengers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which must be read before it is discussed.

Mr. COLE. I hope the Senator will withdraw it.

Mr. MCCREERY. I hope the gentleman will not ask me to withdraw it until he hears it read. This bill provides for the preservation of life against drowning. I want to prevent people from being burned up also.

Mr. COLE. The Senator stated to me the other day what the amendment was, and therefore I knew its purport when I asked him not to press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment must be read before it is discussed.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to add as additional sections the following:

And be it further enacted, That sixty days from and after the passage of this act all fire pumps, water barrels and buckets, and other appliances required by law for the purpose of extinguishing fires on steamers plying upon the navigable waters of the United States, shall be kept in perfect order and ready for immediate use at all times and during all seasons of the year, and that all stoves used on said steamers shall be well and securely fastened to the decks thereof with iron bolts.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for passenger steamers to carry as freight or use as stores, except for the purpose of lubricating the machinery thereof, any of the following-named articles, to wit: crude petroleum, naphtha, benzine, benzole, or coal oil; and the officers or owners of any such steamers, upon which any of the before-mentioned articles shall be found in violation of the provisions of this act shall be required to pay a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 for each and every offense, one half of which fine shall go to the informer; and the United States circuit and district courts shall have jurisdiction under this act.

Mr. CORBETT. I think this amendment ought to be submitted to a committee for examination, in order that it may be attached to some other bill, if there are no provisions of this kind already in the law. I think there are some provisions of law for preventing the carrying of some of those articles. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MCCREERY. I cannot see any possible objection to the adoption of this amendment. This body certainly have time to consider the merits of the proposition. We are all well aware of the terrible accident that occurred on the Ohio river not far below Cincinnati, where the America and the United States came in conflict and nearly one hundred lives were lost owing to the fact that one of those boats, or both of them, were laden in whole or in part with petroleum. In that instance the flames communicated to the tops of those vessels in three or four seconds after the fire commenced, and the whole water for rods around was in a blaze. I think that this proposition that I have introduced is of more consequence than the bill itself which the gentlemen are pressing here, unless they much prefer being burned instead of being drowned. I cannot see why the two measures cannot go together. I cannot see that there is any possible conflict between them. They are providing for life-boats and life-preserving apparatus. I cannot see why we may not at the same time provide against destruction by fire. I trust that the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky in reference to his amendment, whether he has consulted with any men engaged in transportation on the Ohio river, whether it will not seriously interfere with the business of the boats? It seems to me that very much of the business of those boats consists in the transportation of some of the articles mentioned in that amendment, though I am not particularly acquainted with that business.

Mr. MCCREERY. I will answer the gentleman. The freight boats can do all that business; and it is a well-established fact that this article of petroleum cannot be carried on passenger boats with safety. It cannot be stowed in the hold of the boat. It will injure whatever it comes in contact with. It must be stowed upon the deck of the boat, and from the leakage and other causes the decks will become saturated. We all know that these boats carry torches when they are approaching a landing; we know the danger that may arise from a spark; and the whole deck of the boat being saturated with this petroleum or benzine the flames will communicate in a moment. Let not the lives of hundreds of people be endangered from having our passenger boats freighted with this article. Let this description of freight be transported on the freight boats within sixty days from the passage of this act, as is proposed by my amendment.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended so as to read, "A bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels, and for other purposes."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 27, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the credentials of Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, elected by the Legislature of Maine a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to pay the expenses of a delegation of the eastern Cherokees to Washington city; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the report of a special committee of the Ohio Legislature, against the extension of admiralty jurisdiction by judicial construction over the navigable waters of the interior of the country, and in favor of congressional legislation to restrict such jurisdiction to tide-waters and sea-going vessels; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PACIFIC RAILROAD AND BRANCHES.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 202.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate at this time. Does any Senator object?

Mr. CONNESS. What is it?

The CHIEF CLERK. "A joint resolution (S. R. No. 202) more effectually to insure the faithful completion of the Pacific Railroad and its branches according to law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to reserve and withhold from delivery to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and from each of the branches severally connected therewith, Government bonds to the amount of $3,000 for each mile of railroad of the company and each of its branches as a security for the complete and faithful construction of the lines of railroad of each according to the provisions of law; which bonds are to be reserved and withheld until the President of the United States shall certify and declare that the line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and each of its branches have been respectively faithfully completed according to the provisions of law applicable to each; which certificate of the President shall only be made upon the report of commissioners appointed by him, not exceeding — in number, who shall make a thorough and careful examination of each line of railroad after each company shall claim that its road is fully completed; and the expenses of such examination are to be paid by the railroad companies respectively.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to insert in line five, between the words "and" and "from," the word "severally." It is a verbal amendment to make it more precise.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I also move to strike out the words "branches severally," in the sixth line, and to insert the word "roads."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I also move to insert after the word "therewith," in the sixth line, the words "including the Central Pacific railroad of California."

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to speak to that amendment. In the first place, I will say that this resolution came up in the Committee on the Pacific Railroad very suddenly and was reported without material consideration. The general purpose that it has I favor, as I think every legislator should; but I doubt very much the fairness of the rule as proposed to be applied in the resolution. It proposes to withhold an arbitrary sum per mile from each of the companies engaged in constructing the Pacific railroad or any of its branches as a guarantee for the full and complete construction of their respective parts of the road, without any reference to the difference in construction that may exist as to the work performed by each or either of those companies. Therein I think it is faulty, and very much so; and I confess that I should like to see it put upon some other basis, that it should be put upon the basis of the report to be made soon, or that has been made, by authorized commissioners appointed by the President to examine the various roads and the estimates that they have made of the sums necessary to make them complete structures as contemplated by law; or based upon the immediate examination by a new board of commissioners to be appointed by the new President as soon as he shall come into office, so that each company shall be held; and if you please let no more bonds be issued until that report is made to either of the companies; but when that report shall have been made let it describe exactly by as near an estimate as can be the amount necessary to make good by each company engaged in the construction of the Pacific railroad its part of the work, and then let such an amount be withheld until the complete construction and acceptance of the work. I cannot see any other rule that would approach fairness in the premises or that would give the Government the degree of protection that it requires.

What the United States want, as they have contributed and generously to the building of the Pacific railroad, is that the structure shall be a complete one; that it shall be complete for all the purposes of trade, for the safe transition of passengers and freight, and for all the other uses for which it has been projected. The guarantee they want and need is the guarantee that will secure that. There can be no fairness, sir, in exacting a bond from you, you having performed the whole of your duty, that I shall perform the whole of mine; and this resolution as it now stands before the Senate contemplates just such a rule. I hope that the Senate will give it fair consideration, and that when it is passed upon finally it will give the adequate and sufficient security that the Government should have.

Mr. COLE. This proposition, as I understand it, is to withhold a certain portion of the bonds due the several branches of the Pacific railroad until an investigation may be had by commissioners to be appointed to determine whether there has been a compliance with the obligations imposed by law on those companies. It cannot escape the attention of Senators that there are already commissioners appointed by the Government to make examinations of this work. They are required to report upon the several sections of the road as they are from time to time completed, as to the quality of the road, and whether there has been a strict compliance with the law in its construction. If these commissioners have failed to do their duty the proper remedy, it seems to me, is to remove them and appoint more faithful commissioners. We shall gain nothing by the appointment of another set of commissioners, that I can see, in the way of securing a proper compliance with the law; and the resolution which proposes to withhold a portion of the subsidies from the railroads will certainly, in my judgment, work a delay in the completion of the road and it will retard that great work.

The companies engaged in it, I presume, need whatever aid has been offered, and probably they have made their calculations upon receiving that aid. If this is withheld it may work serious postponement in the completion of the work, and unless there is some better reason than has been urged for the appointment of another set of commissioners I hope it will not pass.

I have heard really no complaints against the work so far as the California end of it is concerned, unless it be merely vague rumor. I do not know that there is any authentic, well-grounded complaint against the Union Pacific Railroad Company. If there is, as perhaps the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad knows better than any one else, let the resolution go to that extent, but not to the extent of impeding the work so far as it relates to the other end of the road.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the present resolution is the result of a consultation on the part of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, who had before them a report of a special commission appointed by the President of the United States in October last for the purpose of examining the Union Pacific railroad so far as it had been completed. The commission consisted of General G. K. Warren, J. Blickensderfer, and James Barnes. We all know that General Warren is a very skillful engineer, and he seems to have given the matter which was intrusted to him very careful attention. Among other inquiries submitted to him by the President was one directing him to estimate "the expenditure which will be required in order that the road so far as built may be rendered equal to a fully completed first-class railroad." He examined the route from Omaha westward to very near Cheyenne, and in answering the inquiry, which I have just recited, he states in his report, or rather the commission state in their report, as follows:

"In estimating the expenditure which will be required in order that the road, so far as built, may be rendered equal to a fully completed first-class railroad, we have considered each class of work required in as much detail as circumstances and the desire expressed in our instructions that our report be made with the 'least practicable delay' would allow, and in deciding on the probable amounts required we have been governed by the results of our own observations, taken in connection with data obtained from the profiles, maps, and other sources of information derived from the company. The estimate is as follows: Changing locations to improve line and to diminish curvature at Black's Fork, Red Desert, Rawlins, Rock creek, Red Buttes, Dale creek, Granite cañon, and Hazard, not including cutting off large bends on Rock creek..... $200,000
Completing embankments to full width; filling trestle-works (six and a half miles) and riprapping..... 240,000
Completing excavation of cuts to grade out Black's Fork, Bitter creek, &c., &c..... 20,000
Reducing grades between Omaha and Eklahoma, to conform with condition on which change of line was approved..... 245,000
525,000 cross-ties, to replace those of cottonwood timber, including transportation, removal of old ties and placing new in track, at one dollar..... 525,000
Ballasting, including transportation, lifting track, placing material, surfacing and readjusting track, and curving rails eight hundred and ninety miles..... 910,000
70 abutment and 26 pier foundations, including excavating, piles, grillage, and securing with riprap, at $1,500..... 144,000
30,480 yards masonry in abutments and piers, at $15..... 457,200
8,450 lineal feet Howe truss, namely, 49 spans of 150 feet, and 11 spans of 100 feet, at $45..... 380,250
Supplying 121 openings of trestle-work of 50 feet length and under, between Omaha and North Platte, with permanent works of masonry and girders, at $500..... 60,500
Supplying 254 openings of trestle-work of 50 feet length and under, between North Platte and end of track, with permanent works of masonry and girders, at $900..... 228,600
Supplying 134 openings of trestle-work averaging 103 feet each, with permanent structures of masonry and girders, or short trusses, including foundations, at $1,500..... 276,000
Renewing Dale Creek bridge, or replacing same by embankment and arched waterway..... 100,000
Probable expenditure for additional waterways in Mary's creek, Bitter creek, and other points not provided for, and renewing and enlarging stone culverts..... 100,000
60 new passenger locomotives for through travel on opening of road, at $14,000..... 840,000
Thorough repair, say of one third of locomotives, used in construction and on hand when road is opened, say 50 at $3,000 each..... 150,000
44 new passenger cars, for through travel on opening of road, at $6,000..... 264,000
30 baggage, express, and mail cars, at $3,800..... 114,000
500 box freight cars, at $900..... 450,000
50 additional locomotive stalls, at $4,000..... 200,000
Completing shops at Cheyenne, additional shops at Bryan, and enlarging shops at Omaha, with tools for Cheyenne, Rawlins, and Bryan..... 850,000
Additional water stations and probable additional expenditure to secure full supply of water between Rawlins and Bitter creek..... 80,000
Additional station buildings..... 75,000
Additional snow fences..... 50,000
Additional fencing against stock..... 30,000
Total..... $6,489,550

It will be recollected by Senators that their charter requires them to make and complete the road in the manner of a first-class railroad. It seems to me that if there be such a deficiency as is here stated by the commission—nearly six million five hundred thousand dollars—it is high time the attention of Congress was called to it, and that we ought to enact some laws to secure to the Government the performance of those conditions of the charter which we imposed upon the company, in order to obtain a first-class railroad, which is the railroad they are bound to build.

Now, sir, the present resolution simply requires the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the sum of $3,000 per mile out of the cash subsidy which is to be granted to the Pacific Railroad Company and its branches by its charter, as a security for the final completion of such roads as they are bound to construct by their charter. It seems to me that this is not a very great amount of security for the Government to retain to secure the great object which we have in view. We have no disposition to oppress the company or any of its branches. The Senate will recollect that the company is entitled upon a part of this route to a cash subsidy of $16,000 a mile; on other portions of its route $32,000 a mile; and on other portions, which are the most mountainous portions of the route, $48,000 a mile.

It seems that thus far the road has not been completed and finished according to the terms of the charter; and I think the country may well require that a certain portion of these bonds shall be withheld until the perfect completion of the lines in the manner prescribed by the law; and that is only $3,000 a mile. It seems to me this retention cannot very seriously injure the credit of the companies. It is, however, for the Senate to say. I am simply doing my duty as the organ of the committee who recommended this joint resolution. The joint resolution provides that there shall be appointed by the President to ascertain whether the road is completed or not another commission consisting of — persons. I move to fill that blank with "three." I think that will be sufficient.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. Is there any report in regard to the Central Pacific road before the committee which induced them to couple it with the other road?

Mr. HOWARD. In answer to that question I beg to say to the honorable Senator that no such report has come to my knowledge as yet; but I understand the commission appointed last fall have prepared their report or have it in the course of preparation. What may be the fact as to that I really cannot say. I think, though, no report upon that end of the line has been formally made.

Mr. CONNESS. I answer by saying there was such a report made. The substance of it was sent by telegraph here. I have little doubt that the official report is now received in due course of mail and accessible to the committee. The report of the commission, which was composed of very distinguished men, who examined the Central Pacific railroad was that it would require to make it a first-class road between three and four hundred thousand dollars. The report made by the commission with which General Warren was connected, and from which the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee has read, stated that it would require between six and seven millions to make the Union Pacific road good. Now, what this resolution proposes is to exact a security of less than one half that which the commission report would be necessary to make the Union road a first-class road, but to exact from the Central Pacific company a security five times as large as the commission reported would be necessary to make their road a first-class road. I submit that there is no fairness in that; and I think the committee had better take this resolution and view it in the light of both reports, as the other report must necessarily be here now, and the telegraphic transcript of it is at the Interior Department and obtainable; and they can amend the resolution consistent with the acts. I wish to say very distinctly that I am in favor of the exaction of the greatest amount of security of each and all of these companies, so as to secure their making a first-class road, and to that end in favor of withholding bonds.

Mr. WILSON. When this resolution—

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, if this resolution is to lead to debate I must interpose. I desire very much to get a vote, in the morning hour to-day, on House bill No. 1744, to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin. I trust Senators will allow me to take it up and to get a vote on it, because it is very important.

Mr. WILSON. I was going to suggest that this resolution be recommitted for the purpose of putting it in the shape suggested by the Senator from California, to have a future investigation and have this thing done properly and right. I am in favor of taking security for every mile of the road, central and eastern, wherever it is needed; and I think we ought to have a thorough investigation of the matter, for I have no faith in the management of the Department of the Interior in regard to this road from the beginning, and time will show that I am right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move that the pending order be postponed—

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I will make a motion to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will be the same thing. There is no use in recommitting the resolution at this period of the session. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 1744.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say one word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will allow me to take up this bill and have a vote upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have been endeavoring to call up this resolution, which to my mind is a very important one, and to have action upon it ever since the report was made, which was on the 22d of January last.

Mr. CONNESS. Why not recommit it and let the committee have the whole subject under consideration?

Mr. HOWARD. The country is looking with great anxiety toward this Union Pacific railroad. I have endeavored to do my duty in regard to it. If the Senate now recommit the resolution to the committee it will not of course be my fault; I ask the attention of the Senate to it. If it is recommitted it is clear that nothing will be done on the subject at this session of Congress, nor during this present year.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator prefers to have the resolution recommitted without further debate I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to its recommitment. I think we ought to pass the resolution now.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe my motion is in order. I move to postpone all prior orders and to take up the bill I have indicated.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will allow me to say a single word. I simply desire to say that my purpose in moving to recommit is that the resolution may be reported on Monday morning.

Mr. HOWARD. That is impossible.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not impossible, for we can get those reports. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CRAGIN. I hope the motion to recommit will not prevail. If anything is to be done with this resolution it ought to be done now.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no motion of that kind pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. CRAGIN. That question is debatable, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGIN. Unless this resolution is passed now these roads will be built and completed and the bonds all paid over. Unless this Congress acts on this resolution and withholds the bonds from these companies they will very soon have them in their pockets and be beyond the control of Congress. It is a matter of great importance, and I think it should be acted upon, and that promptly. I hope it will not be recommitted.

Mr. THAYER. I hope it will be postponed, for I have something to say upon it. I desire to state one fact—I am not going to take time in behalf of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. They have already deposited with the Government bonds to the amount of $3,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD. What kind of bonds?

Mr. THAYER. Bonds such as the Government accepted as security for the completion of this first-class road.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering the bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 10.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio I offer the following resolution, in order to send the constitutional amendment to the Secretary of State, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the President of the United States be requested to transmit forthwith to the Executives of the several States of the United States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to the State Legislatures to amend the Constitution of the United States, passed February 28, 1869, respecting the exercise of the elective franchise, to the end that the said States may proceed to act upon said article of amendment, and that he request the Executive of each State that may ratify said amendment to transmit to the Secretary of State a certified copy of such ratification.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the resolution in relation to lighting the Senate Chamber, ask to be discharged from its further consideration, simply for the reason that there is no time to attend to it at this session.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to make a verbal report from the joint committee (so far as that part of it which was raised by the Senate is concerned) to equalize the pay of the employes of the two Houses. I wish to state on behalf of the committee on the part of the Senate that the joint committee had one meeting, not a full meeting however on the part of the House, and agreed on a plan of action. In accordance with that understanding a bill was drawn early in the last session, as early as the month of April, in full, so far as the Senate committee was concerned, with regard to the employes of the Senate, and handed to the chairman of the committee on the part of the House. From that committee we have never heard until within two or three days, when we obtained the papers and also a bill drawn by the chairman of the House committee, which he said he had not submitted to his committee nor had an opportunity to submit because he could not get them together.

I state this in justification of the committee on the part of the Senate, who acted early on the subject. I simply wish to say that under the circumstances, as there is no possibility of having any joint action or coming to any conclusion, the committee on the part of the Senate desire to be discharged by the Senate from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. It exhibits the folly of having joint committees on any subject. The Senate should have passed its bill and sent it to the House.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of members of the Legislature of South Carolina, praying for aid to the Sisters of Mercy in Charleston, South Carolina, in rebuilding an orphan asylum, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WELCH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 241) to restore R. L. May to the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2008) in addition to an act entitled "An act to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion," approved July 27, 1868.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1971) granting a pension to Jacob S. Baker; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1999) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. VICKERS, Mr. FESSENDEN, and Mr. HOWE submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. POMEROY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 2008) in addition to an act entitled "An act to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain persons engaged in the late rebellion," approved July 27, 1868, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate a copy of the report of the commissioners appointed to examine the Central Pacific railroad and to determine what amount of money is necessary to make the same a first-class railroad.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON VESSELS.

Mr. NYE. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the greater security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be entered.

Mr. NYE. If the bill has been sent to the other House I desire to have it recalled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be sent for to the other House if no objection be made.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill mentioned, called up on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, being House bill No. 1744, to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides in the first section that in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; but before any interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature or be paid before maturity the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder.

The second section declares that any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin or a sale of property, or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which as carried into the contract, may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment to strike out in line nine of the first section the words "interest-bearing," and also to strike out the proviso at the end of the first section in the following words:

Provided, however, That before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature or be paid before maturity the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions in lieu of it to report a bill embodying the following propositions:

First, That gold and silver coin is the measure and the par established by the world and adopted by the Constitution of the United States for all property, values, debts, and other pecuniary liabilities; and the Government of the United States having, on the sale of the bonds which constitute the bulk of the national debt, received greatly less, when measured by the par of gold and silver coin, than their nominal amount, said bonds should be discharged by the payment in coin of their value by that par at the days they were respectively sold by the Government; and the future interest upon said bonds should be reduced to four and a half per cent. per annum on their value as aforesaid, payable in coin.

Second, That all other debts and pecuniary liabilities created or incurred since the issue of legal-tender notes, and which do not express to be payable in gold or silver coin, were contemplated and intended by the parties to be met and paid in currency; and on the general resumption of specie payments such debts and liabilities should be discharged by the payment in gold or silver coin of their value by that par when they become due and payable.

Third, That the annual expenditures of the Government should be reduced within the following general scale: for the civil service, $45,000,000; pensions and Indians, $30,000,000; Department of War, $25,000,000; Navy Department, $20,000,000; contingencies and miscellaneous, $10,000,000; and interest on the public debt, $50,000,000; and the whole surplus of the revenue should, be faithfully applied to the extinguishment of the public debt.

Fourth. The taxes which are now so grievous as burden upon the people of the United States should be reduced at least $100,000,000 annually, of their aggregate amount; and a day, within three years, should be named for the general resumption of specie payments.

My object, Mr. President, is to get a general system, according to my judgment, for the settlement of the difficulties of the country in relation to the public debt and the resumption of specie payments to be reported by the Committee on Finance; and in support of that general proposition I beg leave to offer some considerations.

Mr. President, our country and its Government and affairs are in a bad condition. In our recent great civil war the people generally dismissed their habits of business, industry, and frugality, and gave their attention, time, and energies to the absorbing conflict. The Constitution, laws, and restraints upon power ceased to be respected, the just and legitimate objects of the war were abandoned by the men in power, and the conflict on our part degenerated into one for the conquest, subjugation, and enslavement of the insurgents; by them it had been commenced for their separation and independence. The enlarged, illegitimate, vicious, and dangerous purposes of our Government created apprehension and discontent with a large mass of the enlightened and determined opponents of the secession movement; and in the name and with the cry of preserving the Union and saving the life of the nation the party in power made war alike on the insurgents, the Constitution, its supporters, and the liberties of the people, and they were victorious over all. The contest was formidable from the beginning, but its giant proportions were imparted to it by the expanding and criminal ambition of the leaders of the Radical party, who formed the purpose to hold themselves in power, though it should necessitate the subversion of the Constitution, the utter failure of our mixed system of general and State governments, and the political slavery of the people.

Such a game of war and such stakes demanded a proportionate expenditure of blood and treasure, and the profusion of both was far beyond all parallel. More than five million men took part in it, and not less than seven hundred thousand perished. From June 30, 1861, to July 1, 1865, four years, the United States expended in this civil war $8,500,000,000, or double the amount of all the previous expenditures of the Government from its beginning; and from the latter date to June 30 next, will have expended $1,600,000,000 more; and still the liquidative national debt created by it and unpaid is $2,589,081,844. The unascertained debt cannot be proximately estimated, but must largely exceed $1,000,000,000; and the total destruction of property and the blasted fruits of industry in all its fields would amount probably to an equal aggregate, making a grand total of more than twelve thousand million dollars. But the misery and woe which in these terrible throes of the nation rent the hearts and souls of our people, God alone can measure and comprehend.

All, all this vast and frightful sacrifice was offered up to the Moloch of personal ambition and sectional hate, and the people, North and South, were prepared and perverted to this immeasurable folly, crime, and insanity by the arts of a few wicked and daring political and church demagogues. Indeed all factions of church or State "is the madness of the many for the benefit of the few." If both sections in the beginning of our trouble had brought a score or two of their bad men to a public execution they would have averted from their common country those vast ills, and it would have moved on without obstruction toward that grand destiny to which the wisdom and virtues of our fathers had lighted the way. The utter overthrow of the rebellion broke the spell which so long held the southern people; but the pig-headed masses of the North, forming the majority there, are still enthralled, and with frenzied passions and reeling reason they continue to shout and follow their leaders, and will to the final catastrophe. The great national debt which was created as well to make one revolution as to prevent another, and beneath whose galling weight the mass of the people of the United States are crouching to the earth, has no sanctity.

When I contemplate our disjected Constitution and its great provisions and principles in the condition of the débris of the noblest system of autonomy ever formed by man, and see the rightful governments of one third of the States swept away, and other governments, administered by strangers and negroes, forced upon them by a military despotism, and the people of those States stripped of all their rights and liberties, and then reflect that this national debt was largely made to organize and support the lawless power that enacted so much wrong, outrage, and ruin, I confess the feelings of revulsion with which I regard it. I have always been willing to accord untold millions, all of property and life, to enforce the law, to suppress insurrection, to perpetuate the Union under the Constitution, to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution;" but nothing to subjugate and enslave any portion of the people of the United States, or to weaken a single principle of the great charter of our liberties. The utmost that can be asked in reason and decency for the national debt is, not to tolerate and recognize it, but to eliminate it to the utmost verge of justice and equity; and one mode of, so treating it I propose to present for the consideration of the Senate.

Every measure yet proposed relating to the national debt contemplates the payment of the whole amount of the bonds, which is $2,107,886,100, in gold and silver coin. My position is that the United States have the equitable right to discharge those bonds by the payment of their value in gold and silver coin at the dates they were respectively issued, with interest upon such value; and that the excess of interest above that measure heretofore paid upon those bonds should be applied in satisfaction of so much of the principal; and that this difference between the nominal amount and gold value of those bonds, with the usury which has and will have been paid on them by the 1st of July, 1869, amounts to $893,058,112, leaving unpaid but $1,214,787,988; and that the payment by Congress of their nominal amount of $2,107,886,100, would defraud the people of the United States, and pay to the bondholders more than is rightfully due upon them by the sum of $893,058,112.

The United States borrowed in greenbacks and other depreciated paper:

	Greenbacks, &c.	Worth in gold.
In 1862.....	$60,982,450	$44,030,649
In 1863.....	160,987,530	101,890,850
In 1864.....	381,292,250	189,697,636
In 1865.....	279,748,150	208,214,090
In 1866.....	124,914,400	88,591,773
In 1867.....	421,469,550	303,215,303
In 1868.....	425,443,800	312,826,323

Total..... $1,854,836,200 $1,248,466,625
for which were executed bonds bearing six per cent. per annum interest.

There was also borrowed in the same depreciated paper currency:

In 1864.....	$71,110,450	$35,375,383
In 1865.....	109,390,200	70,202,937
In 1866.....	300	213
In 1867.....	340,000	244,604
In 1868.....	23,298,600	17,131,323

Total..... $195,139,550 $122,954,460

for which bonds bearing five per cent. per annum interest were issued or converted.

If these transactions had been between individuals it would be the right of the borrower in law, equity, and conscience to have his bonds reduced to the amount of the gold value of the depreciated paper at the time he borrowed it; and by resorting to the chancellor we could obtain that relief, and also the application of any excess of interest above the rate upon that value to the extinguishment of so much of the principal of his bonds. The Government of the United States is entitled to the same measure of justice. In support of this position I will cite some authorities.

Every shift, device, or subterfuge which the ingenuity of man can invent to take unlawful interest, either directly or indirectly, or by any shift or deceitful way or means, is included in the provision of the statute, (against usury.) Neither are cases of usury confined to precise loans of money; but they extend to cases where the relation of debtor and creditor exist, and to cases where that relationship subsists by the sale of wares, merchandise, and commodities. (1 Sch. and Le., Fr. 192.)

Where upon an application for the loan of money it is by the agreement made a condition of the loan that the borrower shall receive from the lender uncurrent bills at a higher rate than their value in cash or current funds, the loan is usurious. (Cleveland vs. Loder, 7 Paige, 557.)

A note payable in dollars for nominal amount of loan in Commonwealth's bank notes is usurious, and relief will be granted to the extent of the usury, which is ascertained by the value in gold and silver of the notes loaned at the time, and computing interest at the legal rate upon that value, the difference being the usury. (4 J. J. M., 48; 2 Dana, 225; 1 J. J. M., 49; 1 John. Chy., 193; 2 John. Chy., 537.)

Where there is usury in the first obligation it extends to all subsequent ones which comprehend and continue the matter of the first: and the obligor is entitled to the same relief against the assignee as against the obligee. (Campbell vs. Gill, 4 J. J. Mar. 89.)

The authorities that sustain these several propositions are multitudinous, uniform, and from every corner in which the questions arose.

It is thus seen that the true amount of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States, instead of being $2,107,886,100, is $1,214,777,988, and the interest if reduced to four and a half per cent. per annum, as it should be, would amount to $54,665,459, whereas there is now paid upon it $121,022,437. The Government in interest would be saved $66,356,978 annually. The amount of interest that is now paid on these bonds in gold if continued nine years and eight months would make a sum exceeding $1,214,777,988, the equitable and true amount of what is now due upon these bonds; and if the nominal amount of the bonds and this rate of interest should be continued to be paid until they fall due the holders will have received more than three times that amount.

In connection with this subject President Johnson, in his late annual message, propounds this proposition:

"Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt."

This suggestion threw the Senate into a paroxysm of honest indignation, and drew from it the cry of "repudiation;" but it seems to have the solid foundation of truth, justice, and equity, as it would secure to the bondholders the gold value of what was paid the Government for the bonds, with a reasonable interest.

The only point upon which a plausible question can be raised of the justice of such arrangement and the power to make it is as to the interest. States do not allow themselves to be sued by their subjects or citizens, and they establish and modify according to their own will the rates of interest upon bonds which they execute to their people. The interest of the national debt of England was successively five, four and a half, four, and three per cent., and has ultimately been reduced by that Government to three per cent. on the whole of it. Nations, when they reduce interest upon their public debt, generally give it the form of a contract by proposing terms to their creditors, and the latter, having no power to sue or coerce their debtors, are constrained to accept them. There is no freedom of will on the part of the creditors. If there were they would reduce interest on their debts neither for the Government nor individuals. The matter is regulated absolutely by the Government, and when it establishes a reasonable rate of interest there is no injustice to its debtor. Four and a half per cent. on long bonds would be fair and just to the holders of our public debt.

There are four modes of dealing with the national debt by Congress:

1. To pay the nominal amount of the bonds in gold and silver coin.
2. To pay them with greenbacks.
3. To pay their gold value with coin.
4. To repudiate them.

The first would be to give to the bondholders an enormous amount more than they are entitled to by the plainest principles of justice and equity, and would perpetuate upon the people a most oppressive burden of taxation. The second would expand largely and continue indefinitely a depreciated paper currency, a curse that always undermines the morals and blights the prosperity of a people. The third would avoid this spurious paper currency, liquidate the bonds by the standard of every civilized age and country, gold and silver coin, secure to the public creditors all which they can rightfully claim, relieve the people of a large portion of their taxes, and with a wise and economical administration of the Government insure the payment of the national debt and bring the country back to a general and early resumption of specie payments, when a circulation consisting of gold and silver coin, and paper always convertible into it, would represent every pecuniary transaction of society and be the measure of all values. This is the medicine required by the diseased condition of our monetary affairs, public and private, and unless it be administered the fourth alternate, repudiation of the national debt attended with great derangement in business and widespread distress, becomes a necessity.

I have stated all the modes proposed or practicable of disposing of the public debt; and the one which I advocate seems to me to be clearly the most eligible. It would be in harmony, too, with a just and easy liquidation of private debts. Where there is an absence of expression that the debt is to be paid in gold or silver the parties to every pecuniary obligation made since a greatly depreciated paper has been the only circulation, contrasted with reference to such circulation and intended and understood that in it all debts were to be met and discharged. The great mass of such debts were without any question paid in such currency as or soon after they were contracted, and if upon the general resumption of specie payments the parties themselves do not liquidate the residue, the chancellor, on being invoked, would hold them to be paper currency obligations, ascertain their value at maturity in gold and silver coin, and decree their extinguishment upon the payment of such value.

It would be less onerous upon both government and people to have their debts treated as paper currency debts, and to discharge them by the payment of their value in gold and silver coin, than to pay their nominal amount in that currency; for the latter operation would make it impossible to resume specie payments until some time after it should have been accomplished, and would thus long continue the general paralysis of industry and business, while that resumption would greatly energize, expand, and increase them, and thus augment the resources of government and people. The value in gold of paper debts could be obtained after resumption with more facility and certainty than the whole nominal amount of those debts in the paper currency could be before; and thus the resumption of specie payments which would so greatly promote the general prosperity, would be also beneficial to all debtors, whether government or people.

We have seen that the interest at the present rates upon the nominal amount of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States is more than one hundred and twenty-one million dollars in gold and silver coin annually, and that the just and equitable reduction of the principal and interest of those bonds which I have suggested would save to the Government $66,356,978 of that sum. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts from customs, which are payable in gold and silver coin, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, at $160,000,000, which would leave an excess, after paying the interest on the public debt, of $105,334,541 in gold. With that amount, or anything near that amount of annual surplus of gold from the customs, the Government could come easily and speedily to the resumption of specie payments itself and aid all solvent banks and individuals to achieve the same result without material detriment to any, but with great benefit to all.

But I propose not only the saving of upward of $66,000,000 of interest annually by this liquidation of the public debt and reduction of interest upon it, but also that there shall be such retrenchment in the civil service of the Government as will reduce the expenditures from $50,000,000, the Treasury estimate, to $45,000,000; and in the War Department from $75,000,000 to $30,000,000. Thus, in the interest on the public debt a saving of $66,356,978, in the civil service of $5,000,000, and in the War Department of $30,000,000, making an aggregate of $111,356,978, one third of the total amount of the taxes of the people of the United States. That this estimated saving on the public debt can be easily and justly made is manifest; and as to the other two heads the end is not less certain. In the civil service there are a great many items of expenditure that might be wholly cut off without any detriment to the public interest, and many more where the amounts might be advantageously reduced. A retrenchment of $5,000,000 in an expenditure of $50,000,000 in times of such extravagance and profligacy as the present is very moderate; a skillful and willing knife could cut much more with healthful results to the body-politic.

As to the Military Department the practicability and necessity for retrenchment and reform is palpable. An appropriation of $75,000,000 to the Army in the present condition of the country is enormous, and must cover future sinister purposes. For many years before the rebellion the regular Army had not reached seventeen thousand men, rank and file, and for 1860 the appropriations to the Military Department were $15,694,790, and for 1861 were $16,090,941, and in both years for every branch of the service. The great resources of our country and the warlike qualities of our people so signally demonstrated to and now acknowledged by the world, with the practice of justice and moderation by the Government, will give us immunity from collisions of arms with all foreign nations. The Indian tribes within our borders and upon our frontiers are generally yielding in their long and obdurate resistance to our policy toward them; and the prospect is certain that they will make no more serious outbreaks and in the future cause us but little expenditure of money, except in teaching them the arts of civilized life, and for that but a reasonable and moderate amount. African slavery no longer exists, and the States which rebelled in assertion of the principle of secession have renounced it forever and accepted, and now desire to perpetuate, negro suffrage. Between those and the other States there is no longer any differences of institutions to produce future civil wars, and they acknowledge the supreme authority of the United States under the Constitution and are obedient to their laws.

There is no more cause for an army or the presence of soldiers in the southern than any other States; and nowhere in the United States except on the Indian frontier are they required for any proper purpose but to tenant forts and posts and guard military property. There never was less necessity than now for a regular Army in our country; and the gigantic national debt and the load of taxation upon the people under which they are staggering cry aloud for large retrenchment in our Army expenditures, and there is no proper consideration to delay it.

The strength of the Army should be less than it was before the war. Twenty thousand men, rank and file, would give an excess of force; and $30,000,000 ought to cover every dollar of expenditures in the military department of the Government. The retrenchments I suggest would leave the Treasury estimates for the next year's expenditures thus: for the civil service, $45,000,000; pensions and Indians, $30,000,000; Department of War, $35,000,000; Navy Department, $25,000,000; and interest on the public debt, $55,000,000; making an aggregate of $190,000,000. And the Secretary estimates the produce of the revenue for the same period to be $327,000,000, which shows an excess of receipts over expenditures of $137,000,000. But the great and just reduction of the principal and interest of the national debt, the retrenchment in the civil service and War Department, the practice of a general and judicious economy in the expenditures of the Government, the release of the people from more than one hundred million dollars of their taxes, wisely and honestly adjusted, and an early resumption of specie payments by Government and people would give such great impulse to industry and production that the excess of revenue would make good the $100,000,000 of taxes withdrawn from the people and yet leave a surplus of more than that amount. Each year would bring its increasing aggregation to individual and national wealth, general and permanent prosperity would be established on a sound foundation, and the payment of the public debt would be put beyond all question.

Mr. President, the pecuniary situation of the nation is but the aggregation of the situation of the individuals who compose it; and consequently the laws and conditions of the prosperity or adversity of both are essentially the same. If an individual is industrious and frugal, makes more than he consumes, buys and sells at fair prices, pays and receives in gold and silver coin or equivalent paper, and is not in either operation defrauded and plundered by a spurious circulating medium, and owes no debt to eat up with interest and usury his surplus earnings, he is prosperous and may become rich. The nation is not in that happy condition; and it is the object and would be the effect of the combined operation of the several measures which I propose, within a reasonable time, to get back to it. The action of each one would be to aid all the others toward this consummation. The large reduction of principal interest on the public debt would allow the withdrawal of a very large amount of taxes from the people, which would be so arranged as to materially lessen the cost of subsistence and of many crude articles that enter into our manufactures and mechanic arts and proportionably to cheapen all products of the field and the shop.

The resumption of specie payments would not increase the value or the burden of debts, public or private, but it would bring all labor, merchandise, property, and values to be measured by gold, the standard of the world, established for many centuries, and before which every competing standard has heretofore and must hereafter speedily fail. Pure gold is counted at twenty-four carats, and where there is alloy the amount of the genuine present metal is ascertained by that standard throughout the commercial world, and is so everywhere received. The interests of labor and of every legitimate business demand that there shall be a sound and uniform currency; and all communities from which it is banished will thereby be subjected to illicit and heavy burdens. The industry of nations is now largely competitive and is daily becoming more so. The people that have a sound gold circulation have as much advantage in this contest over another which has a vicious paper circulation as one man possessing a healthy, life-giving blood would have in a long personal contest over another whose diseased and slowly-coursing fluid was the sure precursor of death. The crowning achievement of the system which I propose would be to renew the industrial and commercial life and energies of the nation, by restoring to it a sound and healthy circulation.

During Mr. DAVIS's speech, at one o'clock, The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not desire to take the Senator from Kentucky from the floor; and I have no objection, by common consent, to allowing the unfinished business to be laid aside in formally to enable the Senator to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky may proceed unless objection be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS resumed and concluded his speech.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. SAWYER. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a motion that the Senate on Monday take a recess from four until seven o'clock for the purpose of taking up in the evening House bill No. 65, known as the McGarrahan bill.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will be taken up at one o'clock, and not at night.

Mr. SAWYER. I have no objection to changing the time and making it the order for one o'clock, provided it is understood that it shall be considered at that hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to make the bill mentioned by the Senator from South Carolina the special order for Monday at one o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say that I have no knowledge of this McGarrahan case; but to set aside either a day at one o'clock or an evening at seven o'clock to consider a private claim, with the pressure of public business which is now upon this body, it seems to me would be wholly unadvisable. Let that private claim go over until the next Congress. It is impossible to consider it now and discharge our public duties.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another bill before the Senate. The motion cannot be entertained unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to considering the motion?

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made it cannot be received.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Army appropriation bill is regularly under consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend from Maine will consent to let that be laid aside informally. I wish a vote upon the bill which has been under discussion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. With the probability that that will not occupy much time I have no objection to laying aside the Army appropriation bill informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the friends of the bill we have up will speak as little as possible. I do not intend to say anything myself unless it is called out by amendments.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Army bill is not going to be laid aside.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Only informally.

Mr. POMEROY. If laid aside at all it will be for all day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to any informal laying aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the pending bill be passed over informally for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

Mr. POMEROY. I submit that the motion cannot be made to do it informally. It can only be done informally by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does any Senator object?

Mr. SHERMAN. No one objected, as I understood.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I objected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it requires a motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that all prior orders be postponed with a view to continue the discussion and consideration of this subject; and I will state to my friend from Maine that I will then, as a matter of course, stand by him until the Army bill is disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (to Mr. SHERMAN.) Move to lay the Army bill on the table so that it can be taken up again to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Army bill be laid on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my friend withdraw that motion to allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I appreciate the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to consider his bill; but at the same time I feel it my duty to say that if the appropriation bills are to pass at this session of Congress they must be attended to at once and constantly. If this bill is to occupy but a short time I have no objection to yielding to the motion to lay on the table and trying that experiment with the understanding that I may call it up again if it should turn out otherwise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can finish it in an hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; with the understanding that we can finish it in an hour I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will not have an understanding, but we will stand by you in putting the appropriation bills through afterward.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, then, to lay the Army appropriation bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 241) to restore R. L. May to the Navy, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1051) to grant certain islands to the State of Wisconsin as swamp lands, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 512) granting land to the Iowa and Missouri State-Line Railroad Company, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported a bill (S. No. 978) to establish a postal telegraph system in connection with the Post Office Department; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of this day, the report of the special commissioners upon the Central Pacific railroad in California; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill to strengthen the public credit.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] to recommit the bill with instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section one, line nine, to strike out the words "interest bearing;" and also to strike out the following proviso at the end of the section:

Provided, however, That before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature, or be paid before maturity, the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder.

So that the section, if amended, will read:

That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretation of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to the first section of this bill; but my motion will be to strike out the second section altogether. The section provides that in any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, no matter what the consideration, wherever that condition is carried into the contract on the coin basis it shall be legal and may be enforced according to its terms; and that on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of such a contract proof of the real consideration may be given. This section is either utterly useless and superfluous or it is meant to embarrass and limit the recent decision of the Supreme Court, and really to destroy commerce. It can have no other effect. Although it is true that the case in the Supreme Court arose on a contract made antecedent to the legal-tender law, yet the principles of the decision cover all contracts made specifically payable in coin; and there is not the slightest necessity for the second section of the bill. Where a contract has been made specifically payable in coin under the decision of the Supreme Court it can be enforced according to its terms whether made before or after the passage of the legal-tender law, if I do not misapprehend the wording of that decision, and I do not think I do. This section as it stands will give rise to controversy in a variety of shapes. Take for instance a case where a contract is specifically payable in coin, and the consideration is household property. A sells to B his property, say for ten or twenty thousand dollars, and B agrees to pay in gold. A wants to dispose of that contract to pay in gold; he wants the money; he discounts it or sells it, as he has a right to do. The result is that when a suit is brought to enforce it against the party who has stipulated to pay in gold the question whether the price of the property was adjusted on the gold basis or not may become a question of law and may affect the rights of the party who prosecutes. That is one case. Gentlemen may tell me that the courts would decide the other way; but in reality it opens the whole question of commercial law as regards the right of a bona fide holder of commercial paper to enforce it without regard to the consideration. What is the language of the section?

And on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract, proof of the real consideration may be given.

That is not true as regards commercial contracts now under the law merchant. If the holder is a bona fide holder he can recover against the maker of the note, no matter what may be the character of the contract between him and the party with whom he contracts; but this section is general in its language. I do not mean to say that the courts will not apply the commercial law to that; but I do mean to say that this provision opens needlessly a series of litigations, and if the bill passes with this section in it the proper title to give it would be "A bill to increase litigation, to impair public confidence, and to embarrass the operations of commerce."

There is no necessity whatever for this second section. The Supreme Court have covered it entirely in the principle of their decision, and the only effect of it would be to limit and emasculate that decision, and create a widespread series of lawsuits. Then why should Congress insert it in this bill, which is entitled "A bill to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin?" It is a proposition to open the question of consideration in a contract which specifies, no matter what its nature, between A and B to pay in coin. Good faith requires the debtor to pay in coin; but this section imposes a disability on the party who makes a contract payable in coin; that is, it imposes upon the party to whom the coin is payable the further disability that exists in no other contract—that in all cases he may make it a defense at law that the consideration of the contract was not adjusted upon the coin basis. The effect of that necessarily is to increase litigation; and so far from "strengthening the public credit and relating to contracts payable in coin," if the second section is retained in the bill it will destroy commercial confidence altogether.

My own belief is that we ought to approximate to specie payments, and that the decision of the Supreme Court will tend in that direction more than anything else, because of the confidence existing between men when they begin to deal in their transactions upon the payment of coin, whether as to personal or real estate. The use of coin, the demand for it, for the purpose of actual business will have the same effect that it has had in California, where all transactions are carried on in coin. The coin that is now hoarded will come into use, and the effect of it will be that the finances of the country will be in a far better position, because confidence will be restored. But this second section only tends to impair confidence. I move that it be stricken out; and on that question I mean to ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this is an important question, and there is some doubt in the Senate, perhaps I ought to state briefly why this section was inserted. The decision of the Supreme Court does not extend beyond the mere fact that a contract made payable specifically in coin, before the legal-tender act took effect, can be enforced according to its terms. It does not at all reach the proposition made in this section. This section declares that any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be enforced according to its terms, except in certain cases. The criticism made by my honorable friend from Delaware I think does apply to the last clause of the section, and I invite the close attention of Senators to that, because I think it is subject to an objection, and if it strikes the minds of others as it does my own I think it ought to be stricken out. The last clause provides that—

On the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract, proof of the real consideration may be given.

Suppose a suit is brought by the holder of a note without the knowledge of the usury that enters into the contract. Can the payer of the note set up this usury in order to defeat the right of a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument? If so, that is contrary to the established mercantile law which makes the holder of a negotiable instrument hold his obligation free from all equities between the original parties to the note. It seems to me that that last clause may defeat the object of this section. The last clause is not necessary where a suit is brought between the parties to the note, because then the real consideration can be given in evidence as a matter of course under the rules of common law. It would only apply to cases where the suit is brought by a third party who may be entirely innocent. If he had notice of the usury which entered into the original contract as a matter of course the proof of real consideration might be given. But suppose he had not notice, then under this section his right to sue upon a negotiable instrument might be defeated by the want of equity between the original parties.

It seems to me that the whole object of the section, which is substantially the same as one we have passed twice in the Senate, might be effected by striking out the last clause, and I think that would make it much clearer. Then the section would simply provide that the parties may make a contract specifically payable in gold where the consideration itself was founded upon gold value. That is precisely as we passed the same section a year ago twice in the Senate, and I believe that is the substance of the second section as it now stands in the bill, except that the last clause might enable a debtor to defeat a just claim in the hands of a bona fide holder, and I believe would be a departure from the established rule of commercial law, which protects a negotiable instrument from all defenses between the original parties. Now, if my friend from Delaware will modify his motion so as to strike out the last clause of the second section, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Not with my views. I cannot agree to modify the motion, because I do not agree with the honorable Senator. I think the whole thing unnecessary, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court. I admitted in my previous statement that I believed the contract on which the Supreme Court decided was made antecedent to the legal-tender law, as it is called; but the principle of the decision covered all contracts made before or since, where they were made specifically payable in coin. I have not a doubt of it. I cannot enter into that now. I have not the decision before me; but I think if it were here I could satisfy the Senate that there is not a shadow of doubt that this section is utterly unnecessary; and therefore, if it is unnecessary, it is injurious. But, beyond that the honorable Senator desires to put in a modification of my proposition which shall protect the bona fide holder without notice. The first class of cases I stated I think would hardly be covered by that. I have no objection to that modification if I cannot get the section stricken out; but I do not see any necessity for the section itself. I cannot see why or for what purpose the section should be introduced at all, except for embarrassment and to increase litigation and to promote speculation.

The honorable Senator is mistaken in his recollection that we passed a bill a year ago like this in the Senate. The bill that we passed had no such provision in reference to the question of consideration. That bill, which the House never acted upon, simply made legal all contracts that were specifically payable in coin, nothing more. That was before the decision of the Supreme Court; but this clause, which relates to the right to inquire into the consideration where the contract is specifically payable in coin, is entirely the product of this session, and comes from the House of Representatives and never has been proposed by the Senate. In other words, the bill that you passed at the last session was totally different from this section. It was a proper bill then, necessarily, because the Supreme Court had not decided the question of gold contracts; but useless now, though I should have no objection to pass it in that shape if it were desired; but the provision as it stands I am utterly opposed to, and if it is retained I shall vote against the bill, although otherwise I should be perfectly willing to see the first section of the bill passed.

Mr. MORTON. I am myself opposed to authorizing contracts at this time to be executed in coin, but the Supreme Court has made a decision which will authorize any kind of contract to be executed in coin. It is true in that particular case the contract was made before the legal-tender acts were passed, but the reasoning of the Supreme Court does not place it upon that ground at all, nor does the dissenting opinion in that case place it upon that ground. The reasoning of the Supreme Court is put on the broad ground that there are two kinds of money that may be used as a legal tender, what we call United States notes and gold and silver coin, and that parties have a right to contract for either kind of this money; and the decision is just as applicable to contracts made since the passage of the legal-tender acts as to those made before. That being the condition of the question now, under the decision of the Supreme Court, this bill ought not to be passed without containing this provision, because it is a limitation upon the power to make contracts as decided by the Supreme Court. It provides that this right to make contracts shall only be applicable to those hereafter made. That is a very important limitation upon the decision of the court. It provides that contracts to be executed in coin may not be made in regard to loans of legal-tender notes or national bank currency, but only for loans of coin or for sales of property or contracts for labor and service.

Then, being in the nature of a limitation of the right to make these contracts as held by the Supreme Court, I think the bill ought not to pass without containing it. In other words it is to that extent a limitation of what I regard as an evil. Undoubtedly the objection mentioned by the Senator from Delaware as to the concluding part of this section is well taken. It would authorize the question of consideration to be gone into although the paper was held by an innocent holder who had taken it for a valuable consideration; and in this way it would make all contracts to some extent uncertain, because it would be important to the party taking the assignment or the transfer of paper of that kind to know in advance what the consideration was, a thing upon which he could not always be certainly and well informed. Therefore it would create embarrassment in the transfer of negotiable paper. But, sir, on the other hand, if this condition is not put in here it will enable all adroit parties to avoid the whole section. They may for a loan of paper money in violation of the section, by putting it into a negotiable security defeat the entire section. Therefore, regarding this as a limitation upon the power to make coin contracts as established by the Supreme Court, I think if the bill passes it ought to contain this section or something like it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to strike out all after the word "terms" in the eighth line of the second section. That will leave the section making a declaration of the general principle that gold contracts may be made without entering into the details of proof, which will be properly regulated by the courts. This section, as it stands with the words I propose to strike out, might lead to the difficulty suggested, that the bona fide holder of negotiable paper without notice before maturity might be subjected to defenses entering into the consideration of that note, which, by the law as it now stands, such holders of negotiable paper are not liable to. Therefore I move to strike out these words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out of the second section the following words:

And on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from New Jersey tell me: suppose these words be stricken out, upon whom will be the burden of proof rest to show what the consideration of a contract is which on its face is payable in coin?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is a question which it would take a great while to answer. It is a question which would be settled by the general principle of law, by the court doubtless applying these general principles of law when the case arose. In the case of negotiable paper in the hands of a bona fide holder for value before due it would imply that it was a gold contract if the contract so stated, and it would be on the defendant to prove that it was not. In the case of choses in action the law would be different, although there the party making the contract would be estopped by the terms of the contract as between the first contracting parties.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator that a contract on its face payable in coin would import that the consideration was settled upon a coin basis?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If it was commercial paper held by a bona fide holder for value before due, yes.

Mr. HOWE. Suppose it was held by the payee?

Mr. SHERMAN. If it was held by the payee, as a matter of course the consideration could be inquired into without this clause, because the consideration is always open as between the parties to the contract and never closed except in favor of the bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument, so that without the clause the consideration could be inquired into.

Mr. HOWE. I find that the Senator from Ohio differs from my friend from New Jersey and other friends about me in the interpretation of the law as it would be if this amendment were adopted. If the Senator from Ohio gives the right interpretation of it, let me suggest whether it would not be better, instead of striking out these words, to add words which would save the rights of innocent indorsees.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my friend from Wisconsin that there can be no doubt that as between the original parties to the contract the consideration could be inquired into as a matter of course and as matter of law.

Mr. HOWE. But is the Senator warranted in saying that there cannot be any doubt on that when it is positively denied by two lawyers right about me of very eminent standing?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have never heard that denied, and I presume the Senator misunderstood the Senator from New Jersey, because the consideration of a contract is always open between the parties to it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The presumption would be, between the maker and the payee, that the contract was what it stated to be, but the consideration would be open to investigation.

Mr. HOWE. The consideration is simply to pay.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. To pay in coin.

Mr. HOWE. The contract is to pay in coin. The consideration is a distinct thing. When I promise for value received to pay a certain sum of money now, neither the law nor the courts trouble themselves about what the particular character of the consideration is. If the contract says that there is a consideration, that is enough on which to render judgment. But your bill proposes to say that if the consideration is of a particular character and the promise is of a particular character, then the judgment shall be of a particular kind. The contract on its face will show what the promise is; it may not show on its face what the consideration is. What I wish to know is, if you strike out these words upon whom is the burden of proof to show what the consideration is? If the consideration is on a coin basis and the promise is to pay in coin payment is to be made in coin; but who shall show whether the consideration is of that kind or not when the paper is in the hands of the payee?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The presumption is that it is in coin.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Prima facie it is payable in coin, if it says so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Like the law of proving consideration in any other contract. If we strike out these words it leaves the law in reference to consideration to apply to these as to all other contracts.

Mr. HOWE. I did not understand the Senator so before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will not occupy any time; but I think I can convince my friend from Wisconsin that it is better to strike out these words. I am sure he must remember, although both of us left the law a good while ago, that as applied to contracts that are made invalid by statutes of particular characters, as between the original parties to the contracts they are prima facie valid if they appear to be so on their face. But that is merely a question of evidence. The defendant may go into evidence to show that the contract was of a character that the statute did not warrant, and if he succeeds in making that out he prevails. That is perfectly simple as between the original parties to the contract. Then, when you come to an indorsee of negotiable paper he is protected by the general principles of law under a statute like this and under all statutes where the statute does not say in terms that the contract shall be absolutely null and void if he can show that he took the paper while it was current for value and without notice. Now, leaving it on the general principles of law that are perfectly well settled as applied to each particular case which can possibly arise, we make no confusion at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to strike out the second section. On that motion the Senator from Delaware calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order to move an amendment to the section now before the vote is taken on striking out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; before it is stricken out it can be amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "coin" in line two to "labor" in line seven. The latter clause has already been stricken out on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the second section by striking out the words:

And the consideration of which may be a loan of coin or a sale of property or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which, as carried into the contract, may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor.

So that if amended the section will read:

And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire before the question is put on that to state that while I would be myself willing to see the simple declaration made as we sent it to the House of Representatives last year, yet I do believe such an amendment might endanger the passage of the bill in the other House. I do not think the words as they stand change very materially but rather modify and limit the power to make contracts, and they were put in there as a limitation, and the reason why the Senate bill was defeated was simply because it did not contain some guards against usury. Under the circumstances, I think, rather than endanger this bill, we had better take the section as it stands. It is right in itself. This law ought not to be made a pretext for usury, harsh contracts, or injurious stipulations. It should not be made the groundwork of transferring a currency obligation to a gold obligation unless a specie consideration was the foundation. Therefore I would leave the matter in that respect with the guards provided by the House. I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have never been able to see any reason why the people of this country should not be permitted to make their contracts just as they choose to make them. Why should we limit them in this matter? People can protect themselves. I see no danger under this bill as proposed to be amended that one class of the community will be injured by another, which is the argument urged with so much force by the honorable Senator from Indiana.

It may be always the case that it is in the power of one man to impose on another; but I do not think that granting the power to the community to make their contracts as they please, with reference to such medium of payment as they please, will increase that danger in any way whatever. At any rate, the possibility of evil from such a source as that is not, in my judgment, to be compared to the trouble that is brought upon the business community by attempting to provide a limit to their power to make such contracts as they think suitable to themselves. For that reason I have always been in favor of this proposition, and I am more especially in favor of it now, to allow it to an unlimited extent in the fullest possible terms, precisely as we allow anything else, for the simple reason that I believe its effect is to be very beneficial in hastening the return of what we all profess to desire—not all, perhaps, but the greater portion of the community—a return to specie payments. I see no sort of object in making these limitations. They are very trifling in themselves, and I do not think the argument we hear so much of with reference to general legislation of this kind, that we may endanger the bill by adopting a sensible proposition to which I think the House has shown itself sufficiently committed, is of much force in this case. I believe the bill passed the other House by a very large majority; I do not know precisely how much; but I presume the limitations, if they may be called limitations, that are on this section did not influence the mind of anybody in voting upon the general question.

Therefore, although I should not have moved it, because I do not like to interfere with bills coming from committees which have considered them carefully, the amendment being moved, I cannot avoid expressing my entire agreement with the honorable Senator from Missouri, that it is better to put this on the broadest basis, and simply let the people of this country make their contracts payable in what they please. There is no reason why they should not make their contracts payable in any coin just as well as make their contracts payable in every sort of merchandise that they choose to promise to deliver.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should be greatly grieved to see anything imposed upon this bill which would retard its progress or endanger its success in either House, because I rejoice that at last the day has come when Congress is about to say that, taking honesty, integrity, and the force of obligations as the rule, the Government of the United States is to acknowledge and pay that which it honestly owes. But I cannot think that an amendment such as the Senator from Missouri proposes will endanger the fate of the bill. My opinion is founded on the reasons which have been assigned by the honorable Senator from Maine and a further reason which I will state. The Senator from Ohio argues that by dispensing with the words the amendment proposes to strike out some danger by way of imposition or exaction will arise under the enactment which as it stands now would be excluded. I cannot see that, Mr. President, at all.

The argument supposes that the creditor is to attempt extortion on the debtor. Is there anything in the section as it stands now likely to be a barrier against that? Look at one provision; these contracts under the proposed language may always be made for the sale of property. Is there a door wider than that? Suppose one man wishes to lend money to another and take back an agreement obligating his debtor to render him coin in return? It would be only one of the stereotyped, one of the immemorial devices of usury which every man who has tried these causes has long been familiar with, to mingle as an ingredient with the contract the sale of property. It need not be even real estate. I once knew a man very famed during a long life of rigid usury-taking; who always sold either tin-ware or percussion caps whenever he lent money. One of those two things was always an accompaniment, and he could always prove by people whom he was careful to take to witness it that the whole amount of money was rendered all that professed to be, and that there was nothing in addition to it except that on that day tin-ware and percussion caps were also sold. This one phrase, I submit, would leave the section just as open to the extortion of usurers as it would be without any qualification at all, and so of the residue of the language.

But, Mr. President, I have another objection to it. It would be a hotbed of litigation. Here is professedly a certain restriction in these contracts; and every man who is called upon, either by the bona fide holder of commercial paper taken in the ordinary course of business for value before due, or by anybody else, would be at liberty to contest upon the various objections presented here, because although we have stricken out the latter clause of this section all Senators will observe that the amendment only goes to the onus of proof. If the case of commercial paper the defendant would always be permitted to go into the consideration, provided in the first place he could rebut the presumption of bona fide holding; and if he could give evidence that it came to the hands of the plaintiff after it was due, or that he did not pay value, then the question of consideration would be open.

Now, I agree with the Senator from Maine that if coin contracts are to be licensed for the future at all, let us leave parties twenty-one years of age and upward permitted to speak for themselves in all other things, to speak for themselves in that regard also, and do not let us attempt to bind with a mere rope of sand the option of men to make their own agreements. It would fail, as I believe, upon that language; it would stimulate litigation; it would impede commerce; it would establish nothing unwholesome, but would simply diminish the good effect expected from authorizing contracts answerable in the medium and money of the world.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment. I am not sure that the making of the amendment would embarrass the passage of the bill. I do not believe its passage can be embarrassed either by anything you strike out or anything you add. I guess that it is bound to go, and I do not know but that it ought to go. I am going to vote against this amendment because these words which the pending motion proposes to remove from the bill do affect to protect the community against usury, to secure to the community the protection of existing usury laws. It affects that any way; and removing them will strike down that affectation. That the existence of these words there will secure that protection I am not so sure. I am not so sure that the Senator from Delaware is not correct in saying that a recent decision of the Supreme Court covers the whole ground occupied by this section as it stands, or as it would stand if this amendment were made. But, sir, I am one who, unlike the Senator from Maine and unlike the Senator from New York, do think the usury laws of real advantage to the public.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know what right my honorable friend has to say that he is unlike the Senator from Maine in that particular. I ask him if you strike out these words would not coin contracts have all the protection of the usury laws as other contracts have?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; I think not. I said I was unlike the Senator from Maine in that particular, because I understood the Senator from Maine to say, as did the Senator from New York, that men of twenty-one years of age should be intrusted with the making of their own contracts, and if they see fit to make a contract payable in gold, or if they see fit to make a contract payable with ten per cent. interest or twenty-five per cent. interest, let it be so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said nothing about interest.

Mr. HOWE. But that is one kind of contract; and if they can be intrusted to make all their contracts they can be intrusted to regulate the rate of interest as well as the amount to be paid.

Mr. CONKLING. Would these words affect the rate of interest on the usury laws?

Mr. HOWE. I think, practically, they would regulate it very essentially, because I do not see how it is possible for a borrower to get any possible security from the usury laws. He borrows a thousand dollars to-day; he agrees to pay a certain sum in gold six months hence. Every contract to pay money becomes a contract to deliver gold. Certainly the court cannot know what gold is going to be worth six months hence. If a man contracts to deliver a certain amount of gold, that contract cannot be set aside that I see on the ground of usury.

Mr. CONKLING. Would not the price be equally uncertain whether he contracted to deliver coin or greenbacks?

Mr. HOWE. But if a party promises to pay a certain sum of money in the currency of the country, with a certain rate of interest, and that interest is no more than the amount prescribed by law, that contract cannot be impeached for usury. If it is in excess of the rate prescribed by law, it can be impeached for usury; but I do not see how it is possible to impeach any contract for usury if it is made payable in coin, let the consideration be what it may. If the Senator from New York can point out any way in which it can be done I shall be happy to hear it. That will remove my objection.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will permit an interruption, I beg to submit to him a proposition. I understand this language to have nothing to do with considerations of usury. Striking it out, I understand that the usury laws would operate upon it as they would operate upon any other contract. They operate now only upon contracts for the loan or forbearance of money. So they would operate striking these words out; because, if I loan to the honorable Senator—which is a very extreme case, both in respect to his necessity to borrow and my ability to loan—a certain sum of money, with an agreement that he is to pay me that at a future day, with interest, the usury law would take hold of the question whether in truth I did furnish the money, whether in truth he did pay me anything in addition to the promised interest, or not. That, it seems to me, would be so equally with or without these words; the restrictive character of the words, as I understand them, being to confine to certain species of consideration and of contract the option to make them answerable in coin. Now, all contracts by this section are made answerable in coin if they are for the "loan of coin, or a sale of property, or the rendering of labor, or service of any kind, the price of which, as carried into the contract, may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor," which three elements, I think the Senator will agree with me, would permit and introduce all the uncertainty of which he has spoken. I render service in the erection of a house for him, and we determine that that service shall be paid for at a future day in coin. Suppose the market tosses up gold to 285, as it once did, there comes in the uncertainty, without let or hindrance, just as much as it would if I furnished to him money which he was to render me back again on a certain day in coin, with the interest at a certain rate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin I should like to ask the Senator from New York this question: if I should borrow $1,000 of greenbacks, legal tenders, from the Senator from New York, and make a contract to pay $1,000 in gold at the end of six months, that contract would not be vicious on account of the usury law, and yet it would effectually avoid the usury laws if gold is worth 138. Now, I understand this provision is to prevent just that evasion of the usury laws.

Mr. CONKLING. I answer my honorable friend thus, as I understand the laws: first, it is wholly ineffectual to prevent any such thing. Why? Because I borrow from him $1,000. The theory is, I borrow it in coin. Does he lend me the coin? No, sir. On the contrary he gives me his check. What fixes the amount? The price of coin as it is adjusted between him and me on that day, just like the price of any other property. I am aware that there is a market value, which value fluctuates abundantly for the purpose of my illustration. Thus, were the words in, I borrow of him his check, the loan being for coin, the price of which has been adjusted between us. Therefore the whole thing is subjected to the agreement and option of the parties.

But again, no such thing as he speaks of ever can occur in the present condition of the market. Why? Because with the difference between gold and currency of forty in the hundred no necessity, no improvidence, no vicissitudes of circumstance or of the market ever would lead any man to borrow greenbacks to be returned in coin, dollar for dollar, with such a margin marking the difference between them. Until coin approximates greenbacks in its value or the reverse, until the margin gets very narrow, no such thing could occur, because the proposition implies the addition of one third at once to the value of money. Therefore I say to the Senator that his case would not arise until the near convergence of the lines of value between coin and currency, and when the margin gets so narrow as that then I repeat the borrower would be equally, with or without those words, at the mercy of the lender.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, resuming the few words I had to offer on this subject, as I do now, with the better light shed on the subject by the Senator from New York, I concede the proposition which I understand him to make, that even with these words in the bill borrowers or the business community will lose a great part of the protection which they now enjoy from the usury laws. I said in the outset that I was not sure these words did protect against the abuse of those laws, but I said they affected to afford some protection. They affect to afford some protection because they restrict the validity of these contracts to a particular kind of consideration. The bill as it stands says that if a man loans coin or does labor or sells property, the value of which is ascertained upon the coin basis, he may contract to pay for those services or for that property or repay that coin in kind, leaving us to infer that upon all contracts for the mere borrowing of money, all contracts merely between borrower and lender, the law shall stand as it is now, and the promise shall be to repay what we borrow with the legal rate of interest for deferring payment. The Senator says they can avoid that, because they can reduce the greenbacks to the coin value and call that a loan of coin, and take a promise for the payment of coin. I am not sure that that cannot be done. I am not sure that there are not other modes of avoiding the usury laws even with those words in.

I was profoundly sorry, and that is the main purpose I have in saying anything about this subject, to hear of the decision which has been recently pronounced by the Supreme Court. I have been profoundly sorry to see any of these efforts to legalize coin contracts, which would have the effect to strike down the usury laws. I think this Government should be wise enough and strong enough to take the business of this country back to a specie basis, and at no great length of time, without by force of law doing what I think this bill will do if so amended, and what I very much fear the decision of the Supreme Court has done already; that is, to ally and enlist all the poor and all the borrowers and all the debtors together on the side of the bulls in Wall street, making them all clamorous for coin, when we have made it the obligation of nobody in the world to furnish it. I do not mean to take up the time of the Senate, but I cannot help expressing here my dissent to this policy. I believe it is unnecessary, and yet I ought to express that opinion with a great deal of diffidence, because I am bound to suppose that if there was a safer way than this back to the stable foundations of business the very able gentlemen who control the finances of the country in the Senate would have found that way some time ago; and because they have not found it I ought to suppose it was invisible, and yet it ought not to be. I have thought that I could see another way myself, but I have so little confidence in my own eyesight that I have never ventured to express it, and I shall not take the time to express it now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does he understand this second section to modify the decision of the Supreme Court so as to make all contracts invalid except such as are founded upon the consideration specified in this section? What is the effect of this section, supposing it becomes a law, upon the decision of the Supreme Court, in his judgment?

Mr. HOWE. I have not considered that question. I said in the outset that I was not sure it affected the subject at all, and was not sure but what the decision of the Supreme Court covered this whole ground. I have not examined the decision of the Supreme Court with sufficient care to express an opinion upon it. I said in the outset expressly that I did not know but that the Senator from Delaware was correct in saying that this section was wholly needless and nugatory.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, but not for the reason that has been urged here and not because I think it is material; but the House of Representatives do think it material, and being anxious to secure the passage of the bill I prefer to take it as it came from the House of Representatives. The Senate has twice during this present Congress passed the section in the form in which it will be left if the motion of the Senator from Missouri prevails, and both times it has been rejected by the House of Representatives. I am two anxious for the passage of the entire bill to jeopard it, and I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing the propriety of the amendment, but, like the Senator from New York, I do not feel that the adoption of the amendment will endanger the passage of the bill. I cannot imagine such a proposition to be true. If I understand the purport of the decision of the Supreme Court it is to the effect that contracts of this character now are valid, and not only that they are valid, but that they have been at all times since the passage of the legal-tender law. I myself have never had any doubt of that fact. It is true that a decision of the supreme court of my State in a case that I took there myself settled it against me, and I did not choose to take the case any further, but let it rest there; and so far as my own State is concerned we have rested upon the law that a judgment, even though the contract was payable in gold, had to be taken in legal tender. I have never believed it to be the law. I cannot conceive that a contract payable in gold was not as valid as a contract payable in wheat. If gold is demonetized, it is an article of commerce; and why is not a contract in one article of commerce as good as a contract in another?

Now, Mr. President, if this section be adopted as it stands will it not limit the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and will it not make uncertain that which by the decision of that court has been rendered certain? You will observe that no contract, impliedly at least, will be legally payable in gold unless the consideration may be a loan of coin or a sale of property or the rendering of labor or service. One of those three things must exist in order to make the contract valid as payable in gold, and the price as carried into the contract must have been adjusted on the basis of coin value at the time that the contract was made. With that limitation what will be the effect? A contract made between parties, for instance a contract between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself, passes into the hands of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON.] Can it be inquired into in his hands? Can any of these facts be inquired into? Can the character of the contract, can the fact be ascertained whether the consideration was gold coin or a sale of property or a rendering of service or labor when the value was carried into the contract? If that is not the case can it not be very easily avoided by always so arranging the contract as to put it in the hands of a third party? In other words, if I desire to enforce a contract, although really the maker, I would make a contract with a third party and let it be assigned. As some Senator behind me suggested when the proposition was made, if the Senate are not prepared to adopt the amendment we ought to be prepared at least to appoint guardians for all parties making contracts in this country. It seems to me it results in that. If we refuse to adopt the amendment and leave the section as presented by the House it merely complicates our difficulties. Why not declare at once that all contracts made specifically to be paid in coin shall be payable in coin, and of course parties twenty-one years of age who are competent to contract and not under some disability will understand immediately, or at least in a very short time, that such contracts can be enforced and will be enforced, and they will contract accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will only occupy a moment. I hope the Senate will stand by this section as it now is, as the committee has reported it with the slight modification at the end, which has already been agreed to, which will not affect the sense, and which we may suppose will not be objectionable to anybody else. There is something more in this than the mere matters that have been alluded to by gentlemen who are urging this amendment. The object of this section, as it appears to me—and I derive that impression from reading it—is to prevent legal gambling in gold. We are to declare that all contracts made payable in coin of a particular kind shall be valid and enforceable. Now, if you strike that out and say that all contracts of whatever kind payable specifically in coin shall be enforced in coin, you certainly authorize as plainly as the law can authorize anything a person to lend openly, without any concealments, without any device, without any subterfuge, currency depreciated twenty-five per cent. and demand the repayment of it, if he can press his debtor enough to make him agree to it, in coin at the end of a month or at the end of the time he lends it for. We ought not to do that by legislation, because as far as those two items go, of coin and currency, it is really legalizing practical usury without any limit at all.

The Senator from New York has said, it is true, the difference is so great that a debtor could not be pressed enough to agree to that. Suppose he cannot be pressed enough to agree to that entirely, but suppose a creditor lends $1,000 in currency and takes a promise to pay $950 in coin at the end of a month. It enables him to graduate it down to the last drop of the debtor's blood that he can get. Now, the question is whether Congress ought to authorize that species of usury, because it is nothing else as currency now is? So that as far as we can go with safety and propriety, if we mean to protect the business men of the country, who wish to borrow money or who are obliged to borrow money, let us say that they may make their contracts for real transactions upon the basis of gold and pay them in gold; but they shall not be made the prey of usurers and money-lenders and capitalists by making it lawful for the capitalists to lend currency and require payment in coin when currency is depreciated. This section prevents that; but if you strike out what the Senator from Missouri wishes to strike out, instead of preventing it you will legalize it, and I for one do not wish to legalize it.

It is true I am so much gratified at the advance we are making on the subject of public honor and public honesty and good faith in the first section of this bill that I am willing to waive almost all objections to any other part of the bill; but it appears to me that this is an important provision, one that the committee unquestionably must have had in view when reporting it entire, as they did, and one on which I think we shall make a great mistake if we do not stand to it.

Mr. DIXON. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it would be better to strike out the clause as proposed. The section now reads:

That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin or a sale of property or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which, as carried into the contract, may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

I take it as between the parties themselves, without considering the rights of third persons in cases of negotiable paper, the only consideration which can exist in any case is either a loan of coin or money of some kind or a sale of property, or a rendering of labor or service of some kind. I cannot at this moment conceive of any other consideration which can make a contract good at all. That must include everything for which a contract can be made, except possibly the loan of greenbacks. Now, if we propose to legalize these contracts, and to say that there may be a case in which you may go into the consideration between the original parties when the suit is between third parties, then you propose to alter the entire law with regard to the relation of parties in the case of negotiable contracts. I do not suppose it is the intention of the bills to provide that in the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of a contract proof of the real consideration may be given in a case where the paper given—for instance a bill of exchange or promissory note due—has passed into the hands of third parties. That cannot be the intention. We do not propose to change the whole commercial law of the country on that subject.

It seems to me, therefore, better, especially as the Supreme Court, as I understand, have made a decision which covers this whole case, which includes in their reasoning, if not in the actual decision, cases which have occurred since the passage of the legal-tender act, to leave out this section. I know the case upon which they acted occurred before the passage of the legal-tender law; but, as I understand, the reasoning of the court applies to all cases, and their decision seems to go to the length that all contracts of that kind made specifically for coin may be enforced in kind whether before or after the passage of the legal-tender act. If so, the matter is well enough as it is. If it is not so, then we ought in a different manner from this, it seems to me, to change the law, and not to raise a question which can be raised here whether the whole subject of the law with regard to commercial paper and the question of consideration is to be changed. But I will not dwell upon that. I think I shall vote for striking out this clause.

I wish to say one word with regard to the first section. I intend to vote for that section. I see on referring to the Globe as to the debate in the other House—and I suppose it is proper to refer to this official paper—some question was raised as to whether this bill changed the law as it now stands. Some members took the ground that the law was already well understood, that the bonds were to be paid in gold, and that in voting for this bill they only voted to declare the law to be so. That was the opinion of some. One distinguished member from New York took that ground. I do not undertake to say whether that is the law or not. I intend to vote for the bill; and I beg leave to say, if it is proper to refer to it, that I find by the official report in the Globe that all the members in the other House from my own State agreed in supporting the bill. I was glad to see it. I was glad to see that there was no party division so far as the members from the State which I have the honor in part to represent are concerned in the other body on this subject; that there was a unanimous support of the bill; that those of the one party and those of the other party agreed in voting for the bill. The four votes from Connecticut were given for it. I shall vote for the bill, and if my colleague does so also the vote of Connecticut will be given for it here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I inquire if a motion to amend that part of the section which the Senator from Missouri proposes to strike out would be in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be, in the opinion of the Chair. The matter to be stricken out may be first amended before it is stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend that portion of the section by inserting between the words "shall" and "be," in the seventh line, the word "only;" so that the section will read:

That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin or a sale of property or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which as carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale or the rendering of such service or labor, shall only be legal and valid, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not in order now. It is not an amendment to the matter proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see it does not relate to it; but I wish to make one or two remarks on the motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri.

Now, sir, this bill taken as a whole must be construed as legislation in favor of the creditor class of the country, and in that point of view it seems to me it would not be improper to consider that there is another very large class of people in this country called the debtor class, and that they are entitled to some consideration. This section proposes to make contracts founded upon certain considerations legal and valid, and it ought to be so amended if it does not now express that idea, as to declare that only such coin contracts shall be legal and valid, so that there may be no doubt, no door open to controversy and litigation as to the meaning of the section.

The object of specifying these different considerations on coin contracts is this: men are in debt at this time and debtors to a great extent are in the power of their creditors. Suppose a creditor has a mortgage upon a man's farm for a large debt and it becomes due. The debtor at that time is in the power of the creditor, and he may go to him and say, "I demand that you renew this contract and make it payable in coin; otherwise I will foreclose this mortgage and strip you of your property." The debtor is in the power of the creditor under such circumstances, and he may be compelled by the necessity of the case to enter into that contract, trying to save his property and hoping that something may turn up in the future to enable him to comply with its terms. Those are one class of persons who will be protected by this section if it is allowed to stand in its present shape.

Then again, another class of persons are those whose necessities compel them to borrow money. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri should be adopted, then the lender, if the necessities of the borrower are such as to justify him, may insist upon the pound of flesh. He may insist that before he relieves the necessities of the man who seeks to borrow he shall make a contract to pay the amount specified in coin; and many men are deluded in that way into making onerous and oppressive contracts with the hope that the future may enable them to comply with their conditions, and so they become involved. Considering the circumstances of the country and that the great bulk of the money is currency with which the people do business, it seems to me that these provisions which are intended for the protection of the debtor class will produce some effect in that direction; if they do not completely protect them they will protect them to some extent. It seems to me that we can afford to agree with the House so far as this section is concerned, and adopt it as it has been sent to us by that body.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate are about entering into a new field of legislation. Suppose I were to offer an amendment to this bill that hereafter all wills executed should be deemed legal and valid if attested by a single witness. It would strike the honorable Senator from Missouri and everybody else, I suppose, that that was rather a novel and improper subject for any legislation of Congress. Now, what is proposed in this second section:

That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or a sale of property, or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which as carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale, or of the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

What power has Congress to decide what contract shall be legal and valid and what contract shall be void? What power has Congress over the subject of the rate of interest in the State of Kentucky or any other State? What power has Congress to decide what shall be the usurious interest reserved in the contract? All these matters pertain to State legislation. They are subjects over which Congress has no power whatever. The idea of Congress passing a law, general and universal in its operation, declaring what contracts shall be legal and valid and may be enforced according to their terms to my mind is preposterous. Why, sir, what contract is valid in the State of Wisconsin depends on the laws of Wisconsin. What rate of interest is legal or illegal in Wisconsin depends on the law of Wisconsin. What effect the reservation of usurious interest may have in contracts made in Wisconsin depends upon the laws of that State; and so in relation to the laws of every State in regard to these matters; and the Supreme Court of the United States and all the courts of every State in relation to such contracts inquire into what is the meaning and provision of the laws of the State where the contract is made, and they interpret and construe and enforce contracts according to the laws of the particular States in which they are made.

I believe that the utmost limit that Congress has yet advanced is to declare what shall be money; and in that I think they have advanced a very long step beyond their proper sphere. Money is defined by the Constitution; money is established by the judgment and laws of the world; money is gold and silver and nothing else; and the idea of giving anything else, paper or any other substance than gold and silver coin, the character of money and making it a legal tender in the payment of debts, is not only unconstitutional, but very absurd. Nothing is money but gold and silver coin; and when Congress attempted to declare that the greenbacks should be lawful money I think it advanced, as I said before, a long stride beyond the pale of its powers. But now, when it follows up this aggregation of power and presumes to declare by law what shall be a legal and valid contract and enforced according to its terms, it is still further transcending the pale of its power and trenching upon the legitimate powers of the States. All these matters are to be decided by State laws, and by the laws of each State for itself and its people. What contracts are valid or invalid, are void or legal, are usurious or not usurious, and what is to be the effect of usury reserved in the contract, all these matters are to be decided by State legislation for that locality, and the people of each State; and every contract of the kind that is entered into in a particular State, when it is sued upon in a Federal court, or in the court of any State, has to be construed and to be enforced precisely according to the laws of the State in which it is made.

The idea of Congress legislating upon such subjects is preposterous. The State of Minnesota decides for itself what rate of interest shall be usury, what shall be the effect of a contract in which a larger rate of interest is reserved. The State of Minnesota decides for itself what class of contracts in that State are against public policy and void. The State of Minnesota decides for itself what considerations in contracts are vicious and illegal, and must have the effect of rendering a contract void and not enforceable in law; and so every State decides for itself. The idea of Congress entering into this field of legislation and regulating these matters is not only novel, but it is eminently improper and absurd. I think the second section falls because it is wholly without the jurisdiction and the pale of the power of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I hope we shall vote on this. The Army bill is waiting, and I desire to have this passed as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the second section.

Mr. HENDERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, in explanation of his amendment, whether he intends to legalize contracts that are objectionable under the law for other reasons than because of their terms in regard to the currency in which they shall be paid? Is the purpose of the Senator to legalize, if it be otherwise now, all promises to pay in coin, whatever may be the consideration?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state in short my view of this matter. Under a decision of the Supreme Court, as I understand, all contracts now made specifically payable in coin are valid contracts anyhow. I have always thought so, but, as I said before, it was doubted, and not only doubted by the business men of the country, but doubted by the supreme courts of the several States almost entirely throughout the Union. Now, if this bill is passed as it stands we shall have some contracts that are specifically payable in gold that are void. I differ with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Dixon.] There are other contracts that may be made; contracts which may not arise upon any of the considerations mentioned in this bill; and what will be the decision of the Supreme Court on such contracts? For instance, I contract to guaranty the payment of a note made by the Senator from Ohio for a certain consideration that is not a consideration mentioned in this bill. I compromise a suit that is binding in a court of law. That is not a sale of property; that is not a loan of gold, and the contract is upon this compromise to pay in coin. Now, the meaning of the section is, if there is any meaning at all in the proposition now pending, that this is not to be paid in coin. The contract may have been made specifically payable in coin, but yet, contrary to the decision of the court, it must be held, impliedly at least under this section, that such a contract must not be paid in coin.

Now, if we are to legislate on the subject at all, let us say that all contracts made by parties competent to contract, specifically payable in coin, may be enforced in the courts. That is all I propose. The State Legislatures, of course, will determine what amount of fraud may render invalid a contract under this law. It will not affect State legislation, as my friend from Kentucky imagines. As it has been understood in the States since the passage of the legal-tender act, that which was payable in coin before was subsequently payable in greenbacks. All that this section is intended to do is to do away with that presumption. It is, so far as Congress can say, that all contracts specifically payable in coin may be enforced in the courts; that is all, leaving the State legislation to exist exactly as it was before.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that unless the friends of this bill take the bill substantially as it is and do not attempt to modify and change every word or parse every clause of the bill it will occupy the whole day. I supposed the Senator from Missouri would be satisfied with a viva voce vote on his amendment and let it go, but now the yeas and nays are called for. If it prevails it makes legal and valid every gaming contract in the United States, provided it is payable in coin. It makes legal and valid every usurious contract, provided it is payable in coin. The words will read thus if his amendment prevails:

That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms.

That includes all contracts, whatever may be the consideration, whether legal or not, and declares that any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms. The intention of the House was to limit this declaration to certain contracts which ought to be equitably enforced in coin, and it covers every class of contracts that can be lawfully made without usury in coin. I can imagine no lawful contract for the payment of coin which is not legalized by the House section.

Mr. HENDERSON. An insurance contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. An insurance contract is legal and valid if made on a coin basis. Any attempt to change the phraseology in this way will lead to confusion and difficulty.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to ask the Senator what the effect of this act would be upon bonds issued by cities, counties, railroads, and other corporations payable in gold, but the consideration of which is not gold advanced to them; would not those contracts be invalidated?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not prepared to say as to that. If they were made before this act took effect as a matter of course they would not be affected by the act.

Mr. DRAKE. But hereafter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Another answer to that is that bonds are made payable to bearer and are in the nature of a negotiable security passing to bearer, and they are never owned by the persons to whom they are made payable. They are always issued to trustees and transferred from hand to hand, and consequently there can be no question about their validity in the hands of a bona fide holder wherever they may go. That is the answer to the case put by my honorable friend. But if you attempt to make virtually the declaration that all contracts, without excepting any, made payable in coin are legal and valid, as a matter of course you will not only prevent the adoption of this section by the House but you will defeat it in the Senate.

I trust, therefore, the Senate, without prolonging this debate unnecessarily, will take the section substantially as it is which legalizes gold contracts covering the great bulk of the cases—nearly all the cases I can think of where they ought to be legalized. The words of the House certainly can do no harm. They are intended to prevent usury, fraud, and oppression of the debtor class, and to the extent that they will have any effect whatever they are useful; they are not injurious in any sense. No contract is invalidated by this clause that ought to be enforced upon terms of equity and good faith. I trust, therefore, the Senate will take the section as it is.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. Am I right in supposing that he construes the section as it would stand were the words stricken out as authorizing the enforcement of all coin contracts whether usurious or not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Without the limitation I am inclined to think the words of the act would so operate, but the bill we passed in the Senate was so framed that it would not, but provided that all lawful contracts hereafter made may be enforced according to their terms.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I wish to suggest this inquiry to the Senator, based upon that: if it be true that the section as it would stand with the words stricken out would render all contracts enforceable whether usurious or not, what would become of all contracts whether usurious or not falling within the specification if we let the section stand? Obviously, the Senator will see, if divesting the section of the restriction you make contracts generally although usurious enforceable at law, leaving the section as it is equally enforceable would be all usurious contracts if they fall within the description.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator from Ohio. Suppose he alter the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Missouri so as to make the section read in this way:

That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin may be enforced according to its terms. And then leave the whole question of usury to the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely the way we sent it from the Senate originally and the House after fully considering it voted it down. We again sent it in another form with a proviso providing that the contract should not be made the cover of usury. We sent that to the House, and they voted that down. Now that they have inserted words which seem to accomplish a good purpose, which prevent frauds and usury and oppression, why not agree to these words? It seems to me it is idle at this late period of the session to engage in mere grammatical construction of words where the substance is according to our wishes. I therefore hope we shall take the second section stripped of the last clause, which I think would create oppression, and I am perfectly willing to vote for it as carrying out the wishes of the Senate twice expressed by their unanimous vote.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to say that we have had substantially the proposition of the Senator from Missouri in operation in our State during the past four or five years and we do not find any complaint such as is stated by the Senator from Ohio. We have greenbacks and we have gold; we have contracts made specifically payable in gold, principal and interest, and there is no trouble about making these contracts and enforcing them. These contracts have heretofore been held valid by our State courts, and if they are carried to the Supreme Court of the United States according to its late decision I have no doubt they will be held valid there. There is an opportunity as well under the present system to make usurious contracts as there is under the proposition of the Senator from Missouri. I do not see that that proposition, a plain, broad proposition to make contracts specifically payable in coin legal and valid, is objectionable, as I have seen and observed the workings of it in our State, and therefore I feel bound to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, believing it is less objectionable and less complicated and will lead to less law than the proposition submitted by the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I am not able to see why a man of sufficient intelligence may not make a contract according to his pleasure. It is known to the Senate as it is known to the commercial world that there is in fact a difference in value between gold and the paper currency of the country. Now, if two men contracting in regard to a consideration that is legal agree the one to pay gold and the other to receive gold, shall it not stand? I understand that the principle established by the Supreme Court recently will sustain such contracts, though the case was somewhat peculiar in its facts, and the amendment of the Senator from Missouri being made sufficiently guarded I shall support that amendment.

Now, if there be any question about it, why not after the word "contract" in the first line insert the words "otherwise legal and valid?"

Mr. SHERMAN. Read it as it would then stand with those words inserted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. "That any contract otherwise legal and valid shall be lawful and binding."

Mr. SHERMAN. You will have to change the whole phraseology.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The idea of the Senator's amendment, as I understand it, though I do not understand it as clearly as I would desire, is that a promise to pay in gold upon a valid consideration may be enforced in the courts. That idea I wish to support. That thought certainly can be clothed in proper language so as to provide that if a person of sufficient judgment to contract shall promise to pay gold upon a consideration that is legal, that contract shall stand in the courts. That is all I desire to say, and I suppose that that is the doctrine of the Supreme Court, but it may be that the States will not fully regard that decision. It may be necessary that Congress shall make a declaration on that subject. I do not wish to see the action of Congress go beyond its clear jurisdiction on a question of this sort. The supreme court of the State of Indiana has decided that where a party has promised to pay in gold it may be satisfied by a payment in legal-tender notes upon a consideration that under the proposition of the committee would sufficiently support the promise to pay gold.

Now, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri, if he cannot make this read right, then say, "upon a legal and valid consideration." That would be found in the second line of the section. I do not want to vote for an amendment which will appear to legalize a contract that is offensive to the laws of the States; but if the contract be legal according to the laws of the States, then let it be enforced according to its terms. For such a proposition I will vote, although under the decision of the Supreme Court legislation would seem not to be necessary. Yet we have some evidence that it is necessary to give additional strength to the decisions of the Supreme Court. In this District they are disregarded and defied, and perhaps they will be by the courts of some of the States.

Mr. President, I do not design to vote for the first section of this bill. I do not believe in the construction that the first section has undertaken to place upon the former legislation. I understand the first section as it now stands, with the amendments that have been made, simply to provide that all the obligations of the Government shall be discharged in gold unless the law or the contract itself expressly provides that they may be paid in the paper currency of the country. For that proposition I am not prepared to vote, and I say that there is no occasion for passing such a section. It is not practical in its character. It does not propose the immediate payment of any of our obligations, but simply to declare without practical effect a construction of contracts heretofore made. This first section would be a legislative construction of the laws heretofore enacted, an attempt by Congress to put construction upon the laws and contracts heretofore made. That is the first section of the bill. The Senator from Ohio thinks I am mistaken in this respect.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to interrupt him. I do not wish to discuss it, but I look on the first section as a declaration of public policy that the United States ought not to pay any portion of its debt except in gold and silver coin unless the right to pay it otherwise is expressly reserved. As to the strict construction of the five-twenty act, I agreed with the Senator that we had a right to pay in lawful money, but we are bound to pay that lawful money, and ought to have paid it long before this time in gold and silver.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no doubt the purpose of the Senator from Ohio is as he states, but that will not be the proper construction of this section, as I think. It provides:

That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

I have read now the whole section as it stands. The purpose is, first, to remove any doubt, and, in the second place, to settle any conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws. That is the purpose of the section, to remove doubts and settle conflicting interpretations of existing laws under which the debt was contracted. For that purpose this section is enacted, and being enacted it will be a settlement of conflicting questions upon the construction of the laws; it will be a removal of doubts, and make the laws to read that the debt shall be paid in coin. That is the effect of this first section. It is, as I believe, simply to put a legislative construction upon existing statutes. It is not to provide for the payment of the debt, it is not to provide means for its payment, but simply and solely to put a construction upon existing laws.

Now, Mr. President, existing laws do not authorize such construction in regard to a portion of the debt. There are, perhaps, $1,600,000,000 of the debt in the form of bonds that do not provide that the principal shall be paid in gold or silver, but that do provide that the interest shall be paid in gold or silver; and it has been, and is now, a fair argument that when the bonds provide for the payment of the interest in gold and silver, and for the principal without specifying gold or silver, the principal, under such a contract, may be paid in the lawful money of the United States. That is the fair construction; that construction no man, as I think, has yet been able to overcome.

On the 12th of December, 1867, the Senator from Ohio, representing the Finance Committee, made an elaborate report, a very able report, on this subject. In that report reference is made to the act of Congress under which the debt was contracted, to the various kinds of debts that had been contracted, the peculiar terms of the obligation; and I wish to call attention very briefly to this report. The report, speaking of the legal-tender notes, says:

"These new notes were declared to 'be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.'"

That is a quotation mainly from the act of February 25, 1862, the act which authorized the issue of legal-tender notes. I ask Senators to observe the language: these notes were made receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States except duties on imports; and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

A legal tender and payment in discharge of all debts from the United States, to be paid by whom? By the debtor, by the United States. Then, as plainly as words can express it, the United States may use the legal-tender notes issued under the act of February 25, 1862, and the subsequent acts providing for the issue of like notes in paying her obligations except only the interest on the public debt. It is not fair to argue that this law was intended to include obligations of the United States in which she expressly agreed to pay gold, and I do not contend for that; but where the United States has neither in the law or in the security which she has issued promised to pay in gold, does that obligation not come clearly within this statute providing that these Treasury notes may be a legal tender and payment in their discharge?

Then, Mr. President, to my mind it is very clear that this class of public indebtedness may be discharged by the Government of the United States by her legal-tender Treasury notes, and the learned committee, making its report through the Senator from Ohio, did not contend for another construction, but seemed to concede that as the proper construction, for they go on to state that—

"On the 11th of July, 1862, before any of the fifty-two bonds were negotiated, Congress authorized the further issue of $150,000,000 of the United States notes, with a like provision to convert them into bonds at par."

"On the 3d of March, 1863, before any considerable amount of the fifty-two bonds were negotiated, Congress authorized the further issue of $150,000,000 United States notes, and by the same act provided that the holders of United States notes issued under and by virtue of said acts shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging the same for bonds, as therein provided, on or before the 1st day of July, 1863, and thereafter the right so to exchange the same shall cease and determine."

Upon this statement of fact the committee claimed at that time that when the bonds were issued the purchasers of the bonds knew that the Government had issued this large amount of Treasury notes with the quality that they might discharge any obligation of the United States, so that the persons who purchased the bonds from the United States at the time they made the purchase knew that it was the law of the land that these bonds might be discharged in Treasury notes. In another part of this report, the committee say:

"These notes were issued to the amount of $400,000,000 before the bonds were negotiated."

Four hundred million dollars of these Treasury notes had been issued before any persons purchased from the Government the bonds known as the fifty-two bonds, and the logic of the committee in this report is that the purchasers of the bonds then knew that these $400,000,000 Treasury notes might be used in the discharge of the obligation of the Government under these bonds. But there is a very peculiar passage to be found in this report on the sixth page. I will read it:

"If this question—"

The committee is discussing the question of the possibility of discharging the fifty-two bonds with legal-tender notes—

"If this question rested solely upon the act of February 25, 1862, and the bonds had been negotiated under that act alone, it would be manifestly a breach of faith to redeem the bonds with the present United States notes. They are very different from the first legal-tender notes, which, from the limited amount authorized, and the privilege to convert them into bonds, could not have had a less market value than the bonds. But it was found that with such restrictions upon the notes the bonds could not be negotiated, and it became necessary to depreciate the notes in order to create a market for the bonds. The limit of notes was trebled and the right to convert them taken away. The amount of United States notes in circulation when the bonds were negotiated was equal to the amount now outstanding, so that the question arises whether by the terms of these several acts the bonds may be redeemed with notes of the precise character paid for the bonds when negotiated by the United States."

Here is a simple statement of fact that under the act of February 25, 1862, there was authorized but a limited amount of Treasury notes to be issued, $150,000,000, convertible in a peculiar manner. There were also to be issued bonds of the United States, and those bonds could be purchased from the Government by the payment into the Treasury of Treasury notes. When the business thus stood the committee says that the bonds could not be sold; that a market could not be found for them; that for the purpose of creating a market for the bonds steps must necessarily be taken to depreciate the paper currency of the country, and with a view to the depreciation of the paper currency of the country $300,000,000 more of Treasury notes were authorized by Congress so as to float the bonds, to use a common expression of the times. With an issue of $150,000,000 of notes the bonds which the Government desired to sell could not find a market. Then, to create a market and make the bonds an object in the market, the paper money must first be depreciated. The first $150,000,000 that had come into the hands of the people almost at par, as this report says, would not allow the sale of six per cent. bonds. They could not be sold, they would not float the bonds, and therefore they must be depreciated, and that was to be done by trebling the quantity in the market and in the channels of trade and business. That was accomplished so that $400,000,000 or $450,000,000 of Treasury notes were issued, and then Treasury notes were sufficiently depreciated, according to the doctrine of this report, to make the bonds an object in the market. Then the bonds could be floated upon this depreciated currency. The Government deliberately, according to the statement of the Finance Committee—rather I will say Congress, for the committee could only speak for Congress—Congress deliberately and for a purpose issued this large amount of Treasury notes that it might have a depreciated currency in the country, and that the bonds might be worth in the market more than these Treasury notes, and therefore the people would buy the bonds with the notes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the permission of the Senator I wish to say that when he refers to the speech of the Senator from Ohio I do not acknowledge his right to say that the Finance Committee have made the expressions contained in that speech. I suppose the Senator from Ohio holds himself individually responsible for that speech, and there is no evidence before the Senate or the country that the Finance Committee acquiesced in his views of that question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Oregon whether he submitted to the Senate a minority report? This is a report made by Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. MORTON. A report or a speech?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is a report. I am not reading from any speech. I am reading from the report made from the Finance Committee by its chairman on the 17th day of December, 1867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What page do you read from?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am reading from page 6, under the inquiry, as the Senator will see—

"Are they [the fifty-two bonds] redeemable in legal-tender notes?"

That is the subject that the Finance Committee is discussing, and when the chairman makes a report from that committee and the gentlemen who constitute the committee other than himself do not dissent from his views, I take it that it is the doctrine of the committee. This is not a speech—and I will ask the Senator's attention—this is not a speech of a Senator, and although unquestionably the report was written by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, it is not his report; it is the report of the committee, made by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What clause does the Senator read from, which he says amounts to that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will look to the sixth page I will again read what I read before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the sixth page.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The inquiry is,

"Are they redeemable in legal-tender notes?"

The answer is:

"The question now arises whether these fifty-two bonds are redeemable at the expiration of five years from their date in any other money than the coin of the United States?"

"If this question rested solely upon the act of February 25, 1862, and the bonds had been negotiated under that act alone; it would be manifestly a breach of faith to redeem the bonds with the present United States notes. They are very different from the first legal-tender notes, which from the limited amount authorized and the privilege to convert them into bonds, could not have had a less market value than the bonds. But it was found that with such restrictions upon the notes the bonds could not be negotiated, and it became necessary to depreciate the notes in order to create a market for the bonds."

That is the clause that I read from, I will say to the honorable Senator from Vermont.

"The limit of the notes was trebled and the right to convert them taken away."

In two respects the notes were depreciated as stated by the committee; first, in increasing the quantity so largely, and in the second place, by taking away a valuable quality from them. Then there was a market furnished—

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me, I understood him to be arguing that the Finance Committee had reported or said that these bonds were payable in currency. I did not understand him to be referring particularly to that passage of the report, but to affirm that the Finance Committee of the Senate had reported in some way that these bonds were payable in currency, and what I wished to say was simply that the committee as a committee, so far as I know, has never decided in favor of that proposition. If I misunderstood the gentleman I wish to stand corrected, that is all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not discussing that question just then. When the Senator interrupted me I was discussing the question which I intended to be the question, whether the holders of the bonds have an equitable claim upon us now while the difference between paper and gold is so great as it is to declare that these bonds shall be payable in gold? I am not going to say that the committee in this report take the ground squarely that the bonds may be redeemed in Treasury notes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me to call his attention to the statute referred to in this report, the act of March 2, 1863, taken in connection with the report, he will see that the statute does not import any such proposition as he is now maintaining.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to the Senator reading from the act of 1863. Of course it being upon the statute-book it is presumed to be a part of the report as a law is supposed to be a part of the contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The statute of 1863 on this subject of the act of February 25, 1862, touching the five-twenties as they are called, merely says that—

"So much of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for other purposes, approved February 25, 1862, and of the act to authorize an additional issue of United States notes and for other purposes, approved July 11, 1862, as restricts the negotiation of bonds to market value, is hereby repealed."

So that my friend from Indiana will perceive that he is putting an unfair construction on this report, taking it together instead of selecting one line at a time, when he undertakes to say that the legislation of 1863 operated upon the bonds of 1862 otherwise than as merely repealing the limitation in the previous act that they must be negotiated at market value, and that was all.

Mr. SHERMAN. After consulting with Senators—it is a matter in which I have no interest or feeling—I move that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock. It is manifestly necessary from the state of the public business that we should finish this bill to-night, and at the same time it is manifest that if we do not take a recess by five or six o'clock we shall be without a quorum, and thus lose the whole evening. My experience has convinced me that it is best to take a recess at a reasonable hour. I submit the motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree with the Senator; but has not this discussion closed? Can we not take the vote on this question now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should not object to that. I should like it very much. If we can take the vote by half past four it may relieve us from an evening session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does seem to me that unless the Senate has resolved that the public business necessary to be done shall not be done we must vote upon some of these questions. The appropriation bills are all behind, and if we are to go on discussing from day to day and over and over again a question of this kind we can do no public business. I do, appeal to Senators to let us vote on this question. Is there a man in the Senate who does not understand it? Let us vote upon it one way or the other, and dispose of it now, before the recess.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we can take the vote before half past four o'clock I shall be very glad.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who wants to make a speech?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to remind the Senator from Ohio that now for several times there has been no opportunity to rescind the order for a recess when it has been deemed necessary. The Senator occupying the floor has the privilege of putting that over. I hope that the recess will not be taken, but that we shall go on and finish this bill without a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion cannot be put except by unanimous consent, there being another matter pending.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this question is to be debated I do not yield. I do not understand that it is a debatable question to take a recess. I yielded to the chairman of the Committee on Finance for the purpose of making the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the motion. I do not wish to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the motion will be put that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. GRIMES. And that from that time on this bill be under consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, and the Army bill, both.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. With the assent of the honorable Senator from Indiana I move that after this day the Senate meet during the remainder of this session at eleven o'clock in the morning.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish the Senator would allow me to finish before that is put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRAKE. I only ask the assent of the Senator to make the motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course I assent if you want to make the motion.

Mr. DRAKE. I make the motion that during the remainder of the session the Senate meet at eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not enjoy particularly the criticism of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] upon Senators who choose to debate the questions that are brought in here. It was in the midst of my remarks, and it would seem to be on his part an expression of disapproval of the fact that I am occupying some of the attention of the Senate. I did not expect that from him; nor do I receive it from him as that he has any authority to make any such suggestion to me. Here, when important measures as brought up, so far as I am concerned I must be the exclusive judge of what it is decorous and right for me to say. If he chooses he may address himself to the Senator from Ohio and to the Finance Committee, who have brought into this body a proposition by which the bonded debt of this country shall be increased in value $600,000,000 without an increase of the ability of the people to pay it, and without, in fact, the measure being one of practical legislation at all. If this were a bill to provide means for the payment of the debt, to lighten the taxes upon the people, or to adjust the system of taxation more justly and equitably among them, I would recognize its importance. But, sir, when it is brought in for no purpose of the sort, not to decrease the debt, not to lighten the burdens upon the people, not to readjust the system of taxation, but simply to declare here by legislative enactment that the public debt shall all be paid in gold, let the Senator from Ohio be lectured. It is an important measure. It affects deeply the interests of the people. And I claim when a bill like that is brought in the right to discuss it fully and freely and without any criticism from any gentleman of the majority in this body. I have no control here of what bills shall be brought from the committees. But the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee is presumed to have a large control of the business and action of the Senate because of his official relation to the body. He has thought it proper, that committee have thought it proper, to bring in a bill that is not practical in its provisions, but declaratory of the meaning of existing laws, a declaration of the meaning of existing laws in which I do not concur. Therefore, sir, it is right and proper that I should discuss the bill.

When interrupted the Senator from Vermont was calling my attention to the act of March, 1863, as bearing on this. If the Senator had listened to my remarks he would not have said that I was reading a line at a time from this report. He would have heard that I called attention to the act of March, 1863. I called attention to that act because of the use that the committee itself had made of that act. The committee in this report state that act as an important one bearing upon this question, because under that act an additional $150,000,000 of Treasury notes were allowed to be issued of less value upon their face than the first notes, and thereby the currency was depreciated and made to float the bonds. It was an act that I had called attention to, and the Senator will see that that act is referred to by the committee on page 5 of the report;

"On the 11th of July, 1862, before any five-twenty bonds were negotiated, Congress authorized the further issue of $150,000,000."

After this act took effect the five-twenty bonds were negotiated. Why does the committee make that use of the acts of 1862 and 1863? To establish this proposition I presume that when the purchasers from the Government of the five-twenty bonds paid their money into the Treasury they did it with the knowledge that this act provided that the Treasury notes might be used in payment of the bonds. And it is after the committee has referred to these two laws that the committee goes on to say that the last two, the acts of July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, were in pursuance of a policy to depreciate the currency, so as to furnish a market for the bonds.

Then, Mr. President, according to the facts stated in this report, what equitable claim have the bondholders upon Congress to make this declaration at this time? Before these bonds were sold, before they could be sold, before the moneyed men of the country would purchase the bonds, Congress had to issue Treasury notes in such quantities as would depreciate them and make them in the market of less value than the bonds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. What does he mean by saying that the moneyed men of the country were the purchasers of these bonds, when his own candidate for the Presidency truly stated in a speech which he made which exhausted the subject that a very large proportion of them were held by those who represented the widows and orphans of the country?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not discussed this question or thought of it in any partisan or political sense. When I spoke of the moneyed men of the country I spoke of the persons who had money with which to buy the bonds. These bonds in some instances, rare indeed, were purchased by persons of limited means, but in the great part, as I have no doubt, by persons of means who wished to make a profitable investment; and they waited, it seems, according to this report, until the first issue was troubled and the currency depreciated, and then with the depreciated currency the bonds were purchased from the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that he is for sacrificing the poor in order to punish the rich?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not propose to sacrifice anybody; and when the rich man and the poor man, if the gentleman will insist that the poor man was the purchaser of these bonds, purchased these bonds from the Government and had notice upon the statute-book that they might be redeemed and paid by the Government with legal-tender notes, it is no sacrifice of anybody when the Government complies with that contract; so that it is not a question of sacrificing anybody. The very Treasury notes that the purchasers of the bonds paid into the Treasury when they bought the bonds had printed upon their backs that they were a legal tender in the discharge of the very bonds that they were buying. Every single legal-tender note that was paid into the Treasury in the purchase of a five-twenty bond had upon its back this extract from the law making it a legal discharge of the bonds at the pleasure of the Government. So, Mr. President, it is not a question of sacrificing anybody. It is simply a question of what is the contract. If the contract be that bonds shall be paid in gold, then I am the last man to ask to violate that contract; but if the contract be that they may be paid in Treasury notes, then I am opposed now, while there is this large difference between paper and gold in the country, to a law which has no practical bearing except to commit the Government to a construction of the laws contrary, in my judgment, to their true and just and proper meaning; and I call the Senator's attention to another passage in this report:

"It is clear that if the bonds are 'payable' when due in legal tenders, they are 'redeemable' after five years from the date in same kind of money. The word 'payable' imports a duty or obligation which must be performed at the time stipulated. The word 'redeemable' implies a discretionary power which may be or may not be exercised. But the same kind of money in the same mode tendered will redeem a note or pay a note."

So that the committee then took the square ground that if at the end of twenty years these bonds may be paid in legal tenders, of course it follows that at any time after the expiration of five years they may be redeemed in legal tenders.

Mr. President, I should like to know of the Committee on Finance if they propose now to pay off the five-twenty bonds? Are we in a condition without a further issue of Treasury notes to pay these bonds to the bondholders? This is not a question that is confined to the rich men or the poor men of the United States. It is a question that affects the bondholder in Europe who has made his investment in our securities because of their value. He had full knowledge of the terms of this law. The foreigner when he purchased our bonds knew very well when he read the law, and he is presumed to have read the law, that they might be paid in legal tenders, or, in the language of the law, "in the lawful money of the United States."

So, sir, this question of appreciating the bonds by the bill before us does not apply alone to citizens of the United States, but wherever these bonds are held an additional value is to be given to them by this act, and for what purpose? For no benefit to the people; not to lighten their burdens; not to readjust the taxes, as I remarked, equally among all, but only for the purpose of making gold bonds out of bonds that might have been paid otherwise in legal tenders.

Mr. President, I did not suppose it was necessary that this question should be raised at this time. I think if the right policy be pursued we may in the end come to a specie basis for our currency. I do not look for that at any early day. I do not expect it to be brought about by any action of Congress in regard to the currency, either in extending or restricting the circulation of the country. I look only to the productions of the country for the restoration of our currency, for its increase, for its appreciation.

Upon this subject I differ very widely from my able colleague. He thinks that by action of Congress we may appreciate the legal-tender currency of the country and bring it up to par with gold, I believe, in about two years. I have no such opinion. I think his proposition would simply produce a very great contraction of the currency. I think in the first place it directly proposes to hoard the gold in the Treasury. The effect of his proposition would be to make persons holding the legal-tenders hoard them also, so that the currency of the country would be to a very large extent contracted. But I do not care to discuss that now. I do not agree with him in his very ingenious proposition. I am not in favor of a contraction of the currency, because that is oppressive to the business of the country. I am not in favor of such an increase of the currency of the country as will destroy its value in the pockets of the people. We must, as far as Congress has control of the subject, furnish to the people the best currency that can be commanded and in such quantities as the legitimate business of the country requires.

But, Mr. President, I look to that policy of the Government which will encourage production; which will introduce into our business affairs stability and confidence and restoration of free Government and encouragement to business and to enterprise, so that here at home we may become producers of those staples that will command a foreign market, and so that the currency in gold and silver shall turn toward our own shores instead of being carried from them. Our business now every year is carrying from us large sums of gold. While that is the case I am not able to see how we can return to a specie basis for our currency. Our paper money will not go abroad. Experience shows that we cannot use either our national bank paper or our greenbacks in purchases abroad. If our purchases abroad exceed our sales abroad that difference must be paid in gold; and while nearly seventy millions annually of the gold of the country is being carried to Europe to pay the difference between our purchases and our sales we cannot have a specie basis to our currency; and all paper promises, all promises by law or otherwise, however ingeniously supported by argument, will but deceive and mislead.

Mr. President, we must have productions that will command a foreign market. New England ought to command a market at home with the advantages of high protection which she now enjoys. I should be very glad to see the looms of New England and the mines of Pennsylvania supply the channels of trade throughout the country. I should be very glad to see it, but I do not understand how it is that they keep putting up their prices so much when they have such extraordinary protection. Their prices still go up so that the foreign article can be brought in here and sold. There is some fault somewhere in that respect. I think that the wants of the revenue of the country furnish such a protection to domestic manufactures at this time as that it is extraordinary that so large a supply comes from abroad.

But, Mr. President, my main hope is in the production of the staples that always command a market abroad. Our wheat sometimes commands a market abroad; our stock raised in the great Northwest, many of the productions of the Northwest; but the important staples that command a foreign market are found south of the Ohio river—cotton and tobacco. It is a fact to which my attention was called upon an investigation of a kindred subject that during the three years after the close of the war, cotton and tobacco constituted one half of our exports, including, as I now recollect, the coin that was carried abroad, perhaps including the bonds that were sold abroad; but I am not sure about that.

Now, Mr. President, if we but have stability in our policy, and our policy be wise, we can increase our productions, we can increase the productions of the staples to which I have referred, and command a foreign market. The word "king" is offensive to gentlemen as applied to cotton. It is not important at all whether it be called "king" in the market or not. It is an article, produced as we produce it, of the quality that is found in the United States, that always commands a market; and so of tobacco. Then, let us have a policy which will increase the great productions of the Northwest and of the South and of the Southwest, and increase our sales abroad so that they shall exceed our purchases, and we shall soon have a restored currency, both in its value and in its quantity.

I am in favor of such reasonable issue of Treasury notes as the business of the country may require. I do not expect to vote for any increase of the bank currency; I do not think it necessary to interpose the credit of a bank between the people and the credit of the Government. The bank notes rest for their credit in the business world upon the Government securities that are filed in the Treasury. I would rather have the promise of the Treasury direct than the indirect promise of the Treasury coming through a bank.

Mr. President, if we can adopt this policy, can restore the balance of trade so that we shall sell as much as we buy and secure a return from other countries of the precious metals, then the difference between our paper money and our gold and silver will rapidly decrease. That is the restoration that I look for, in the legitimate prosecution of business and trade in the country and in our foreign commerce. When that is done the questions that are attempted to be provided for in this bill will disappear. We shall have then a currency of uniform value. I do not look for it before that time; but if these bonds are to be paid now, or if they are to be paid at any time when there is a difference between the paper currency and the coin of the country, I want them to be paid according to the contract.

After the contract has been executed, after the purchasers of the bonds have paid a depreciated currency into the Treasury upon a promise that they should be paid in like money, I am not willing by a subsequent Congress to change the contract and to say it shall be gold and, as the difference now stands between paper and gold, to increase the value of the bonded debt from five to seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks upon this first section. This question is more particularly a question as to the propriety of passing this law at this time. Looking at this question in a point of view for the advantage of the whole country, I do not understand that Congress are enacting laws or levying taxes to pay the national debt at this time. The debt does not mature for the next fifteen, twenty, or forty years. It simply resolves itself into this: by declaring that these bonds are payable in coin we advance the price of the bonds, and for all those bonds which are sent abroad we get just so much more money or gold in return. In other words, we retain just so much gold in the country in place of the bonds that are sent out of the country. If we can advance the price of these Government bonds five, ten, or fifteen per cent., what is the result? Suppose we send $500,000,000 of bonds out of the country, by an advance of exchange we gain by that if we advance it ten per cent. $50,000,000; if twenty per cent. we gain $100,000,000 for the amount of bonds exported.

As I said before, we do not propose to pay these bonds yet and for some years to come, or till they mature probably; we are only preparing to pay the interest upon them which is payable in gold. Therefore the burden is no greater upon the Government in paying the interest of these bonds than though we do not pass this bill. I say we must expect to return to specie payments before these bonds mature. It is the view of the Finance Committee, it is the view of Congress and the view of the people and the commercial community, that before these bonds are paid we shall return to specie payments. Therefore this bill does not add one cent to the debt of the Government. We can only pay the interest on these bonds in gold, and we derive that from the duties on imports, which are payable in gold. This is simply a financial measure. What would you do if you had bonds out that were seventy-five cents on the dollar? If your own notes were out, worth seventy-five cents on the dollar, would you not promise to pay gold to satisfy your creditors and thereby raise the value of the notes, or would you keep them in doubt? We are sending these bonds abroad continually. We are sending amounts, perhaps, varying from twenty to thirty or forty millions a year, and whatever price we can advance the bonds to over and above the present price we gain just that much to the country.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the idea that this adds to the debt of the Government is a fallacy. It does not in reality add one cent to the Government debt, because we do not propose to pay it at this time. I simply wished to present the matter in the light in which, as I understand, the Finance Committee and Congress and the people view it. It is just advancing the price of the bonds so that whatever bonds go abroad we get just so much more money or productions from abroad in return for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Coles, Conkling, Corbett, Dixon, Fessenden, Henderson, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, and Trumbull—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Rice, Sawyer, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—84.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, Whyte, and Yates—22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. COLE. Before that question is taken I desire to move an amendment to the section, to strike out the word "hereafter," in the second line, so that it may apply to all contracts, whether made prior to the existence of the law or contracts that may be made hereafter. I believe from the intimations I have on the subject that the decision of the Supreme Court goes to the extent of affirming contracts made payable in coin that have been made heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, to strike out the word "hereafter" in the second line of the second section.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, to strike out the second section, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ABBOTT answered to his name.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to address the Senate on the subject-matter of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take the vote on this amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I observe that the Senator from Delaware, who made the motion, does not appear at this moment in his seat, and it is so near the time of the recess that perhaps we had better take the recess now.

Mr. SHERMAN. He said to me that he had accomplished his purpose, and was feeling unwell and went away.

Several Senators. Let us vote on this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I insist on the vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to the vote being taken on this particular section. I wish to address the Senate on the general subject of the bill, and may discuss the second section also.

The call of the roll was resumed and concluded, resulting—yeas 7, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Howe, and Wade—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, Whyte, and Yates—23.

So the Senate refused to strike out the section.

Mr. McCREERY. I now move to strike out the first section of the bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out after the word "that," in the third line, the words "in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted," and to strike out all of the section after the word "to," in the eighth line, in the following words:

The payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

And to insert the words:

An early resumption of specie payments by the Government in order that conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled, and that the same may be paid in gold.

So that the section, if amended, will read:

That it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to an early resumption of specie payments by the Government in order that conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled, and that the same may be paid in gold.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe the hour for the recess has arrived.

Mr. COLE. If the Senator will give way I will move that we now take a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate, according to order, will take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p.m.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 979) for the more equal distribution of national banking capital; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 242) to authorize the recognition of the independence of Cuba; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask to have the resolution read at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the United States observe with profound interest the civil war existing in Cuba, and sympathize with its people as with the people of all American nations in their efforts to secure independence of European Powers; yet the United States cannot depart from its established policy of strict neutrality until by the usages of nations the people of Cuba establish a de facto Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to recognize the independence of Cuba whenever in his opinion, according to the usages of nations and the precepts and practice of Spain, a de facto Government is maintained by the people of Cuba which secures liberty to all its inhabitants and other essential principles of a republican Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 243) relating to the Turko-Greek controversy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COLE. Ask that the resolution be read at length, and then I will consent to its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the great Powers of Europe the grave concern with which the United States would regard any further interference on the part of those Powers favoring the perpetuation of the Turkish supremacy in the isles of Greece.

Mr. NYE. That is all over. I hope we shall have no such thing introduced here.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Mr. RICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up House bill No. 1758 for consideration.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; let us go on with the business regularly before us.

Mr. RICE. There will be no objection to this bill. It is simply to organize a Masonic relief association in the city. It has passed the House and been reported upon favorably by the Committee on the District of Columbia. There can be no objection to it at all.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1758) to incorporate the Masonic Relief Association of the District of Columbia. It proposes to incorporate William Mertz, Edward Edwards, Thomas B. Campbell, A. C. Adamson, John J. Callahan, A. T. Dessau, John McClellan, E. H. Atkins, Richard Goodhard, Thomas Rishton, C. H. Dickson, T. D. Winter, H. V. Cole, F. H. Donahue, Thomas U. Graham, M. A. Watson, W. D. Chase, Thomas Dowling, R. B. Tompkins, James O. Lee, Charles H. Kern, and Robert Ball; and their successors, by the name of the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia, with the usual powers of a corporation. The particular business and object of the society or corporation is to be to provide and maintain a fund for the benefit of the widow, orphans, heir, assignee, or legatee of a deceased member immediately upon proof of such death.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. NYE. I should like the Senator from Arkansas to tell us what he means by it exactly.

Mr. RICE. This bill is drawn from a bill of incorporation by the Legislature of the State of New York for a Masonic association in the city of New York. It is with a view of concentrating certain funds, so that there shall always be a sufficiency to supply not only temporarily but permanently the widows and orphans of deceased Masons. The association is to be made up of the members of all the lodges, and this is to be a perpetual fund that is not to be used or diverted for any other purpose, or ever to be distributed among the members, but is to remain in the corporation to be devoted to that exclusive purpose. I do not know of its adoption elsewhere than in the city of New York, but it has been adopted there, and, my information is from Masons here in this city, with entire success. They have organized this association heretofore, and have been acting under it, but now wish to have it incorporated. I have heard of no objection to it. The bill has been before the House and before the Senate for a long time, and there has been no objection from any Mason of the city; but on the other hand, there have been frequent applications to me since it was put under my charge to see that it was passed this session. That is all I know about it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Has it passed the House?

Mr. RICE. It passed the House, and has been before the Committee on the District of Columbia for some time. It was referred to me to inquire into. I made the inquiries, and every one of whom I did inquire seemed anxious to have it pass, and I so reported to the committee, and they directed me to report it favorably to the Senate, and I was also requested to call it up and secure its passage.

Mr. NYE. I do not wish to object to it if I understand it; but I do not understand from the bill itself that they became the custodians of all the funds of all the lodges in the District. I do not see myself what is gained by it.

Mr. GRIMES. The lodges do not have anything to do with it according to this bill.

Mr. RICE. It does not divert any money from the lodges, but it creates a new fund.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the lodges have not anything to do with it?

Mr. RICE. Not at all. It is for the creation of a permanent sinking fund for a specific purpose to apply to any Mason regardless of the lodge to which he belongs.

Mr. GRIMES. It is not limited to Masons. Neither the corporators nor the directors are limited to Masons.

Mr. RICE. They are Masons.

Mr. GRIMES. They may be Masons now, but they are authorized to elect anybody else to become directors that they choose to associate with them.

Mr. RAMSEY. That can be no objection if the corporations are willing to act on so liberal a plan.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no objection to the bill if the Congress of the United States sees fit to occupy its time in passing an act of incorporation for such a purpose as this.

Mr. RICE. It is almost a literal copy of a bill incorporating a similar institution in the city of New York.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

McPHERSON MONUMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate now resume the consideration of the finance bill.

Mr. WILSON. Before that is done I hope the Senator will allow me to call up a little resolution in regard to the McPherson monument, which is now lying on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 466) donating condemned cannon and muskets to the McPherson monument. It authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish to the McPherson Monument Association, of Clyde, Ohio, four pieces of condemned iron cannon, four pieces of condemned brass cannon, twenty-five cannon balls, and one thousand condemned muskets with bayonets to be placed about the monument.

Mr. GRIMES. What on earth do they want muskets for?

Mr. SHERMAN. The plan of the monument contemplates that they should have them. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. No. 2009) authorizing the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 468) authorizing the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to change its name to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1204) to confirm certain private land claims in the State of Missouri; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it is quite time that we commenced with the business which we came here this evening to transact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for the payment of coin is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] upon which question the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the relations which we bear toward this great question of finance are not those of a party. We, as members of the Senate and members of the House, are not parties to any contract with anybody. We are here in a representative capacity, representing not only the tax-receivers but the tax-payers, and the duties which we owe are equally binding upon us toward them both. In discussing this great question as to what shall be done with the finances of the country we must bear in mind the fact that we represent both the bondholders and the tax-payers. We represent them all, because the two classes combined embrace the whole of the American people and all the States. The tax-payers on the one side and the tax-receivers on the other are the parties to this gigantic controversy which is now upon our country and which may rest upon it for, it may be, a generation to come. In meeting these great questions we must meet them as judges, as men who, under the Constitution, are clothed with the power of dealing with them, not as parties to them at all, but in a judicial or a representative capacity. We are bound to do justice and justice to them both. If we deny the just obligation toward the creditor, that is repudiation. If we deny the just obligation to the tax-payer, that is repudiation also; and it is repudiation as oppressive, as unjust, as unjustifiable as the repudiation of the public debt. We must do neither; we must stand upon the contract in its spirit and in its letter. We must stand upon the principles of eternal justice and equity, not as parties, but in a much higher relation—as judges upon whom the responsibility of decision rests. There is no higher tribunal upon the earth than the Congress of the United States in dealing with this question of finance. No suit can be brought by a creditor against the Government; no suit can be brought by a tax-payer in any tribunal against the Government; but here in this Senate and in the House of Representatives the question must be considered. Before this high tribunal, having sole and exclusive jurisdiction over the whole matter, stand these parties. On one side are the bondholders, with $2,000,000,000 of bonds; on the other side the thirty or forty million people, who are the tax-payers, and must bear the burden, whatever it is, both of the principal and the interest. We are here to discuss and decide this question neither in the interest of the one nor in the interest of the other, but to do justice between them both for the good of our common country and those who are to come after us.

Mr. President, when we bear in mind that Congress is no party to these bonds, although many of its members may be bondholders, that Congress has nothing to do as a Congress with the contract, but that it is sitting in judgment upon the just claims of the bondholder on the one side and the just rights of the tax-payer on the other, Congress must rise to the height of this great argument and take the responsibility. In view of the principle of eternal justice, in view of the contract, both in its letter and in its spirit, Congress is to decide between them.

Now, Mr. President, this measure is brought forward at this very late period in the session, and pressed upon the Senate for its decision at a time when our term is so short that we can hardly have an opportunity to consider it; and when members of the Senate are so impatient of any discussion why should a question as important as this be pressed at this late period of the session, and pressed with haste, with pertinacity, and almost with a disposition to complain of any man who rises here to give utterance to his opinions upon it? I say to the honorable Senator from Ohio this is one of the most important measures which have been brought forward at this session, or can possibly be conceived to be brought forward at any time. And why has this measure such great importance? Has not my honorable friend from Ohio, in his speeches in the Senate and in his reports to the Senate from the Committee on Finance, from time to time urged the funding of the national debt at a lower rate of interest? Have we not often heard him, as we have heard many others, say that this great amount of interest at six per cent. in gold is more than the people can bear, and that it is necessary that we should fund the debt at a lower rate of interest? Sir, it is this high rate of interest which is pressing upon our people. It is this high rate of interest, higher than any Government has ever paid or can ever pay for any great length of time upon a debt as large as this, which presses down our people and calls for some financial remedy.

But what is this measure? This measure, Mr. President, is in substance to put it out of the power of this Government to fund the five-twenty bonds at any lower rate of interest than six per cent. Pass this bill, and what is the effect of it? Let us see. I refer particularly to the five-twenties, for it is upon the five-twenties that this bill has its operation. This bill says substantially that whereas a conflict of opinion has arisen whether the five-twenties are to be payable the principal in gold or not, for the purpose of settling these "conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged for the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver."

Mr. President, allow me to ask you how you can fund the five-twenty bonds bearing six per cent. interest into a bond bearing a lower rate of interest after the Congress of the United States in a public act expressly pledges the faith of the Government to pay the five-twenty bonds, principal and interest, in gold at six per cent. Sir, put the case home to yourself; suppose you had $10,000 in five-twenty bonds, and Congress now enacts this statute and declares that the faith of this Government is pledged to the payment of those $10,000 with six per cent. interest, principal and interest in gold; and then afterward suppose my honorable friend from Ohio should propose to exchange bonds bearing five per cent. interest, or four per cent. interest, or four and a half per cent. interest with you for those five-twenty bonds, you would laugh in his face; you would not take his bonds; you would not consider his proposition. It is impracticable and absurd to talk about funding the five-twenty bonds when you have passed this bill.

Mr. DIXON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DIXON. My question is whether the resumption of specie payments will not have the same effect; whether if we were to resume specie payments to-day the effect would not be the same; and whether the Senator's argument does not go against the resumption of specie payments until the debt is funded at a lower rate of interest?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the question of the resumption of specie payments is altogether a different question; a question that depends, in my opinion, upon other considerations; a question which is to be determined by the revived industry of the country, and which is to take a period of time, I cannot say how long, but perhaps a long period before specie payments will be completely resumed; but it does not bear on this question. I admit if specie payments were resumed by everybody, by the Government of the United States and by private individuals, and our greenbacks were as good as gold, that the question as to the five-twenty bonds would have disappeared, because practically there would be no other money than gold and silver, or its equivalent; for greenbacks then would have become the equivalent of gold and silver.

Mr. DIXON. Could you then fund at a lower rate of interest? Would not the same argument apply to that subject?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question of resuming specie payments is an entirely different one from the question I am now discussing; and if my honorable friend will allow me, it is distracting my argument upon this bill and drawing me off on altogether another subject of consideration, the question of the resumption of specie payments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now, Mr. President, to return to the subject. There are some authorities to which I should like to refer and to give some information which has come into my possession. I have had placed in my hands by a friend in the city of New York a copy of a letter from a gentleman connected with a financial house in London in which originated the scheme of funding the first national debt of the United States and which was carried through to a success. This gentleman says:

"In this office in the year 1793 the first scheme for the mode of discharging the principal and interest of the six per cent. stocks of the United States was first eliminated, and it was ultimately adopted and carried out by Congress. It was an accumulative interest of two per cent.

Having been intimately connected with the funds of the individual States from that date to this time it will be readily comprehended that I have steadily followed and studied all the financial matters connected with the different loans of the United States.

It is evident to me that a large loan in sterling money might be raised in this country, the proceeds to be applied to the payment (in greenbacks) of the six per cent. bonds known as five-twenties.

A stock bearing four and a half per cent. interest, principal and interest payable in sterling, and having an accumulative sinking fund of one and a half per cent., which would pay off the debt in thirty-one years, could be negotiated at seventy-five per cent. in sterling money, and this sum of money converted into greenbacks will pay the capital of the debt at par and leave a balance to the Treasury.

"The larger the loans the wider the basis and the more marketable it would become."

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to remind my friend of a fact at that point. We passed at the close of the last session and sent to the President of the United States a funding bill based upon that idea of having a sinking fund of one per cent. and a bond paying four and a half per cent. interest, and the President, with whom my friend is so much in love, pocketed the bill, and we have never seen it from that day to this.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend from Ohio is now raising another question. I wish to discuss the point on which I am addressing the Senate, to wit, that if you pass this bill, in which you pledge yourselves and the faith of this Government that you will pay these five-twenty bonds in coin, principal and interest, at six per cent., you cannot after you have made that pledge fund them at a lower rate of interest.

Mr. CORBETT. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend will excuse me. I am endeavoring to make an argument. I do not intend any discourtesy to the honorable Senator.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question right on the point he is discussing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend has just come in. I have been questioned by gentlemen on the right twice on that point, and now on the left my friend who has just come in puts the question over again. I confess that for one I do not like the mode into which we seem to be falling in the Senate of the United States, that the moment a Senator rises to address the Senate three or four begin to put questions. It is not the best mode of discussing and arguing questions, in my opinion. I think it beneath the dignity of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must not be interrupted. It is a new practice in the Senate, and a bad one.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was referring to information contained in this letter which I think important. The writer continues:

"To make this proposition clearly understood I will suppose that a foreign holder of $10,000 of six per cent. bonds, redeemable after five years, before twenty years from date of issue, he gets $600 per annum, which he sells for four shillings sterling per dollar, equal to £120 per annum; but he is in doubt if his capital may not be returned to him at any moment in greenbacks, in which case at this time the rate will be two shillings and nine pence per paper dollar, equal to £1375."

He speaks as a foreign capitalist. He tells you the truth, that the holders of these bonds, both at home and abroad, feel an instinctive consciousness that the principal of their bonds may be paid to them in greenbacks under the terms of the law under which they were issued.

"If he can exchange his bonds in London and obtain £2,000 of four and a half per cent., true he will only get an income of ninety pounds per annum, but there he will be sure of £2,000 ultimately, and as the bonds would be drawn payable at par he would be sure of the cash within thirty-one years, which is the entire period requisite under the action of this accumulative sinking fund."

But if he held twenty bonds of £100 each he might reasonably expect to have two of them drawn every three years on an average. The commercial world has now become used to the action of these accumulative sinking funds and to calculations dependent thereon for the profits arising from the difference between the par value of the drawn bonds and the price at which it is replaced in the market that we can and do estimate it in this instance at about one half per cent. annum on the capital. If this be added to the interest it will make the total five per cent.

"As soon as it is notified to the holders that any of the present bonds are called in for redemption in greenbacks and that the coupons thereon would not be paid after a certain date the holders would become very anxious and debate in their minds the propriety of sending their bonds to the United States to be cashed or of making an exchange in London, thereby saving all the commissions and other expenses."

"To show the effect of this proposition on a large scale we will deal with having interest to the extent of £400,000,000 sterling now carrying six per cent. interest, say £24,000,000. If nothing is done to alter matters at the end of thirty-one years the debt will be the same, but if my plan be carried out it will be paid off altogether, both principal and interest."

"Each bond of $1,000 or £200 should give the owner the option of receiving the capital for his bond when drawn under the action of the sinking fund either in America or in London, giving three months' notice. And the same applies to the coupon, which should be either forty-five dollars or nine pounds, at the option of the holders, which is customary in the European loans."

The point to which I wish to call special attention is that British capitalists do understand that these bonds, which were issued under those laws of Congress authorizing the issue of greenbacks and making those greenbacks a legal tender in the payment of everything but the interest on the bonds, may be called in and may be paid in greenbacks. There is precisely the same understanding in the German market.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The evidence is the market price of the bonds, precisely running pari passu with the value of the greenback as compared with gold. It is because they know it was not a gold contract that they doubt whether they can receive the gold. True, as parties to the contract they will press upon this Government to pledge itself to pay principal and interest in gold; and so will the bondholders at home; it is their interest to do so. But what is the fair construction of the contract? When these bonds were issued the very law which authorized them to be issued declared that the legal-tender notes which were authorized to be issued should be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of every public debt except the interest and except the duties on imports. When it is so declared in the law, and when you take into account the fact that what the Government received was depreciated paper money, and when the bondholders took the bonds they took those bonds under a law which declared in express terms that that very same lawful money which they loaned to the Government should be a legal tender, should be received in discharge of all debts, public and private, except the interest upon the public debt and duties upon imports, they knew that they took the bonds subject to that contingency.

I have no desire to waste the time of the Senate; I simply wish, as briefly as possible, to express my views on this question. I will refer you to the authority of one of the ablest men of our time or of the last generation, who is still living among us—a man for a long time a member of this body, the associate of Webster, of Wright, of Calhoun, of Clay, and of Benton, and in some respects greater than either of them; I refer to Mr. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio. When speaking upon this great question how these bonds are to be construed in the eye of justice, how they would be construed by any court, he holds this unequivocal language:

"The act of February 25, 1862, which provides for the issue of the $500,000,000 of five-twenties, provides expressly that Treasury notes, which it also authorizes, shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports and of all claims and demands of every kind whatsoever against the United States, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts public and private within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

"This law is the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow the money. Having defined his powers in this it gives him instructions as to the management of the finances; but these instructions have nothing to do with the loan or the contract with the creditor no more than the economical resolution of the ordinary debtor has to do with his contract with his creditor. The creditor in either case has much interest in the general good financial management of his debtor, but a departure by the debtor from his expressed purposes is no breach of the contract unless it be distinctly inserted and expressed as a pledge. In this case the United States borrows its own legal-tender notes and stipulates that the interest on the bonds which it exchanges for them shall be paid in gold; but the creditor is at the same time told, and it is made part of the contract, that when the principal becomes payable at the end of five years he must receive in payment legal-tender notes, precisely the character of funds which he lent, unless by a new arrangement the creditor may give him something which he prefers; and there is no pledge contained in the law or in the contract, unless raised by forced implication, that the United States will not provide in due time in the way deemed most expedient legal-tender notes to make the payment."

What is said of promises made by the Secretary of the Treasury and his agents, that the bonds would be redeemed in specie, is so far absurd that no respectable lawyer would venture to urge it in a court of justice. The act of Congress, which was the Secretary's power of attorney, was in the hands of the whole reading public, especially of the capitalist and his counsel, who could not fail to know that the Secretary had no power to pledge the Government by parol, or in any manner not written down in the law. He doubtless entertained and expressed a strong opinion that specie payments would be resumed before the bonds became payable, but the nation is certainly under no obligation now to bankrupt itself and add its whole wealth for ages to the already enormous profits of the capitalists in order to make good the prediction.

"This settles the question as to the right of the United States to pay these bonds in legal-tender notes if nothing more acceptable to the debtor and creditor can be agreed on. I would then propose that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare and hold ready for delivery $1,000,000,000 in bonds, payable at the option of the United States at any time after the expiration of forty years, bearing an annual interest of four per cent., payable semi-annually, both principal and interest in gold, continue by law the payment of gold for the customs duties and pledge their proceeds for the payment of interest on the bonds until they be paid and retired, and by a present act appropriate the proceeds of those duties to the payment of such interest during the continuance of the bonds, and authorize and require the Secretary of the Treasury, without any further act of appropriation, to pay such interest as it shall accrue, and exempt the bonds from taxation by the United States and all States and Territories and all municipal corporations in any State or Territory or district within the United States."

Again, I quote his clear and powerful statement of the true equities of the case:

"We are not bound in faith or morals to make the fund which we pay to the creditor for his principal—be it what it may, gold or legal-tender notes—worth more at the time of payment than it was worth when it was borrowed. This appears to me strictly just the view which a righteous arbitrator or judge would take of the subject if submitted to him for decision; and it were better for the creditor than an exuberant generosity which would promise him more than he is entitled to when the debtor is but just able to comply with his actual contract, fairly interpreted. Looked at in this point of view names are nothing. If you borrow a piece of coin called a dollar, having in it one hundred cents' worth of pure metal, and by virtue of your sovereign power so debase your coin that the dollar contains but seventy-five cents' worth, it is repudiation or its equivalent act of injustice. If you, in behalf of the nation, borrow coin having in it but seventy-five cents' worth of pure metal and call it a dollar and afterward improve your coin and put in it one hundred cents' worth of pure metal to make the dollar and pay this improved dollar to discharge the loan of the baser coin it is generosity to the lender and injustice to the nation; it is taking from the tax-payer without reason and giving to the capitalist without consideration; the same is the case whether the fund loaned and borrowed be adulterated coin or depreciated currency."

Now, Mr. President, put this case: suppose that you in your individual capacity were the sole creditor of the United States, holding all its five-twenty bonds, and suppose that you in exchange for those bonds gave depreciated paper money worth only fifty cents upon the dollar, and the Government by the express language of its contract with you, the express language of the law by which it authorized the bonds to be taken by you, declared that that same paper money which you give to the United States in exchange for the bonds shall be taken by you for the principal of the debt, and that meantime the interest upon it shall be paid at six per cent. in gold. I ask you would it be just for you, having given paper money worth but fifty cents on the dollar, having received for six or seven years six per cent. interest in gold upon that depreciated money, which would be equivalent to twelve per cent. upon the gold value with which you parted, would it be just in the sight of Heaven for you to say that you would not take back the same money in payment, when it is just as valuable and more valuable than that which you let the Government have? Would it be just in the sight of God or man to persist on payment in gold of the whole amount of the face of the bond? That is the question. If the Government had said in the bond that they would pay you in coin it would be bound to pay it; but it said they would pay you interest in coin, and that the paper money which you let the Government have should be a legal tender in the discharge of every debt, public and private, except the interest.

Mr. President, the great question with us is how to reduce this amount of interest, for as Mr. Ewing says, in that able paper to which I have referred:

"It is not the depreciated currency but the heavy annual interest on the debt that pressed with such enormous weight on the productive industry of the country. We, the people, want to reduce this burden of interest and bring it within manageable compass."

That is or should be the great purpose of our legislation; first of all, of course, to reduce our expenses within the range of economy, but as far as the public debt is concerned to reduce the rate of interest by funding the debt in some shape at a lower rate of interest. The burden of taxation in this country has become so great that everywhere the great mass of the people whom we represent, and whose interests we are bound to defend as well as the bondholders', whose interests we also are bound to protect, according to a fair construction of the contract with them, are so heavily burdened by the taxes which are now drawn from them that it is all-important that the Government should take no step by which it renders itself powerless to reduce the rate of interest. I maintain that if this bill shall pass which declares that it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of the principal of these five-twenty bonds as well as the interest, it will put it out of our power to fund this debt at a lower rate of interest, without repudiation. The burden will become so great, so oppressive, and the great mass of the people will feel it to be so unjust that it may be the means of creating throughout the country an excitement against this mode of dealing with the public debt so great that we may have greater troubles than we have yet conceived of in the discharge of our indebtedness. The burden of debtreasing upon us almost realizes what Sidney Smith said would one day come upon Brother Jonathan if he should ever indulge in the fiendish luxury of war. He declared in 1820, in speaking of Brother Jonathan, and what he declared then seems almost to be prophecy now:

"We can inform Jonathan what are the inevitable consequences." "Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on everything on earth and the waters under the earth; on everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice; on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribands of the bride; at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The schoolboy whips his taxed top; the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman pouring his medicine which has paid seven per cent. into a spoon that has paid fifteen per cent. flings himself back upon his chintz-bed which has paid twenty-two per cent., makes his will on an eight pound stamp, and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from two to ten per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers to be taxed no more. In addition to all this, the habit of dealing with large sums will make the Government avaricious and profuse; and the system itself will infallibly generate the base vermin of spies and informers, and a still more pestilent race of political tools and retainers of the meanest and most odious description; while the prodigious patronage which the collecting of this splendid revenue will throw into the hands of Government will invest it with so vast an influence and hold out such means and temptations to corruption as all the virtue and public spirit even of republicans will be unable to resist."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Whose lucubrations are those?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Sidney Smith. He was giving advice to Brother Jonathan not to go to war and get into debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not to have a revolution against British power!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not to go to war and get in debt.

Mr. DAVIS. Is that written about the present condition of things in this country?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This was written a long time ago, as long ago as 1820. One of my friends here suggests that it is a little out of date. Mr. President, old-fashioned, homely truths seem to be getting out of date; but it is well enough occasionally to remind ourselves of some of these wholesome truths. Here, almost as if he were an inspired prophet, he gave to Brother Jonathan, forty years in advance, a foretaste of the luxury he would enjoy after having great wars with their armies, debts, and taxation. Sir, we have almost realized this prophecy to the very letter. The very first point, as it seems to me, in dealing with our financial question is in some mode or other to reduce this exorbitant rate of interest upon the public debt; and I think that this bill with which my honorable friend from Ohio is charged is the very bill of all others to prevent him from ever changing the five-twenty bonds into bonds bearing a lower rate of interest.

Mr. President, I hold that the principles of sound morality require me to deal justly with the whole people of the United States. If the law provided that when the creditor parted with this depreciated paper and took the bonds of the Government we should pay him six per cent. interest in gold, and that he was bound, if we tendered him back the same money which he let us have, to take it in discharge of his debt, if such was the law of the contract, then I say it would be repudiation on the part of those who contend that the Government shall now declare that these bonds shall be paid, principal and interest, in gold.

What have you done, sir? You have issued your paper until the currency has become depreciated so that it stands at the depreciated figure now of seventy-five cents on the dollar; precisely the same as if you had introduced just so much copper into your coin; and there is no more justice in saying that a contract which has been made between man and man in reference to this depreciated money shall be enforced by payment of one hundred cents in gold than there is in saying that the whole debt shall be repudiated. It is injustice both ways.

Suppose, sir, that instead of issuing this paper by which we depreciated our money to seventy-five cents on the dollar you added one fourth of copper to your coin and then put it in circulation as the lawful money of the country, and men had all arranged their contracts on the depreciated basis; will you tell me that it would be right to insist that the debtor shall pay one hundred cents of pure gold in the dollar when his contract was only made for seventy-five cents of gold in the dollar? There is no justice in it. It will not bear scrutiny. You cannot go before the tribunal of earth and heaven, where justice is done, and maintain that it is just to enforce a contract made in depreciated money in an appreciated money. I agree that those contracts which were made before the passage of the legal-tender act, before the depreciation of our currency by this vast inflation of paper took place, were payable in gold and silver; and I never believed that Congress had the power to discharge those contracts in anything but gold and silver, and when the legal-tender act was before this body I moved in the Senate of the United States to except from the operation of that law all contracts made before the passage of the act, upon the express ground that the contract was made in reference to gold and silver as its basis, that the men entering into the contract had agreed in substance to pay so many ounces of gold and silver of a certain quality in order to discharge the debt, and the Government had no power to change that; but in relation to contracts in futuro the rule would be different, because since the passage of the legal-tender act and the depreciation of the standard of value by the infusion of this vast amount of paper which now stands at a depreciation of twenty-five per cent. contracts are now made in reference to this depreciated currency, and therefore justice requires them to be enforced in this depreciated currency or its equivalent.

What did a contract made any time within the last two years to pay a given number of dollars mean? So many of the current dollars; and what are they? Your lawful money, your circulating medium; and the Government has no right to come in now and say that these contracts can be discharged only by a different kind of currency. We have no more right now, in my opinion, to compel private debts or public debts to be discharged in a currency of one hundred cents pure gold on the dollar than we had in the beginning to say that contracts which had been made payable in gold and silver by their terms—for the law of the case was a part of the contract—should be discharged in depreciated paper. We have no more right to say the one than we had to say the other, and we have no right to do either, and the Supreme Court, by their decision, as I understand the reasoning of the Supreme Court, have placed themselves upon that position. Although the case decided was one which arose before the passage of the legal-tender act, and one in which gold and silver coin was specifically promised by name, still the reasoning of the case in my opinion goes so far as to hold that all contracts made previous to the passage of the legal-tender law would be enforced in gold or its equivalent. Therefore, sir, having that view of the case, I voted to strike out the second section of this bill altogether.

Mr. President, if instead of issuing paper money we had done what almost every Government upon the face of the earth has done, and which I think we have done on a small scale on two or three occasions, if we had alloyed our currency, depreciated it by adding to it so much alloy at the beginning of this war, if we had taken away one fourth of gold and added one fourth in copper, so that the real value of a dollar in gold, instead of being one hundred cents of pure gold would have been but seventy-five cents, and that had been our currency during all this time, and you had parted with your bonds to the public creditor and received that amount of currency, what would you say now if Congress should by law declare that bonds which were given in exchange for seventy-five per cent. of gold and twenty-five per cent. of copper should now be paid one hundred per cent. in gold without any copper or alloy? Would it be just?

Mr. President, I know that on this question there is a great division of opinion. There are around me gentlemen who maintain one side just as earnestly as I maintain the other side. What is advisable to be done? In my opinion it is better to rest upon the law as it is. If the law under which you issued your bonds by its fair construction makes the principal payable in gold let the law stand where it is; but if the law be otherwise, as I maintain its fair construction is, let the law stand; do not come in now with a new declaration which is equivalent to issuing over again your five-twenty bonds. It is just the same as if you took in all these five-twenty bonds to-day and passed this law that hereafter they shall be paid in gold coin, principal and interest, and then issued them again to-morrow. That is the effect of the passage of this bill; and what effect will it have in Wall street? What effect will it have in the markets of London, Paris, and Frankfort-on-the-Main? Who does not know that the effect of this declaration will be at once to produce a great amount of speculation in the markets in New York and abroad? Perhaps the speculations have already been made; the purchases on time perhaps have already been made by millions and by hundreds of millions, and fortunes, if this bill passes, are to be realized by the operators in Wall street to the extent of millions upon millions of dollars, and what good can it do our country? What good does it do towards relieving our burdens? Does it enable you to fund your bonds at a lower rate of interest? How does it enable you to reduce the amount of taxation?

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I have no disposition to stand in the way of the action of the Senate; but this question is so important that I could not allow the bill to pass without frankly expressing some of the opinions which I entertain upon it. I have done so freely. I do not believe it is wise. If the honorable chairman who represents the Committee on Finance desires ever to succeed in what is most to be desired in reference to the public debt, the reduction of the rate of interest which it bears, I do not believe that he can succeed by pressing this bill through the Congress of the United States. He had better pause and let things be as they are. Let the industry of the country revive; let economy begin to be practiced; call home those Americans who by thousands upon thousands are all over Europe carrying our bonds abroad and spending the proceeds and bringing home nothing valuable in return; let him urge and let all the men who lead public opinion urge upon our people a more economical mode of life, less extravagance in life, in dress, in equipage, for it is in these things that the substance of our people is now eaten out. Sir, it is by economy, it is by industry, it is by reviving all the industries of the whole country, East and West, North and South, that we can ever hope to overcome this great difficulty which stands in the way of our progress.

We were not always burdened thus. The time was when the burdens of this Government rested so lightly upon all the people that they were scarcely felt at all; and I believe the very prosperity of our condition, the burdens of our Government resting so very lightly upon all sections of the country, was the basis of one of those fatal delusions which led the people of the South to believe that the Government had no power to maintain itself, because it imposed no burdens upon the people which could be felt—the burdens and the blessings of this Government rested upon us like the air which surrounds us, essential to our life and our being, yet we do not feel it. And may we hope and trust that the time will come when industry, frugality, and economy will be revived, when we shall once more enjoy what we enjoyed in the past, a Government whose blessings came down like the dews of Heaven, unseen and unfelt save in the richness and the beauty they contribute to produce.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I cannot persuade myself even at this late hour of the session to permit this bill to go to a vote without expressing my dissent to its provisions. I regret that it comes in for discussion so late in the session, for now its discussion must be attended with more or less restraint. I believe the second section of the bill is rendered entirely unnecessary by a recent decision of the Supreme Court. That decision, as I understand it, goes to the extent of sustaining a contract payable specifically in coin, a contract made prior to the rebellion, but the principle enunciated in that case I believe covers all other specific contracts, and is sufficient to sustain contracts made after the passage of the legal tender law as well as contracts made prior to that, and it will cover all cases of specific contracts which may be made hereafter. If I am correct in this there certainly can be no necessity for the passage of the second section of the bill for any purpose of authorizing specific contracts in coin. But it is alleged that the passage of this section is desired for the purpose of restricting the operation of this decision of the Supreme Court. If so, I am equally opposed to it.

I am also opposed to the first section of the bill, which declares that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States except in the cases where the law authorizing the issue of any of said obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver. This proposition was before the Senate over a year ago, and was then very fully discussed. Since that time until these last hours of the session it has been permitted to rest upon your table, and is now brought up, as I believe, without adequate opportunity for its discussion.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] this afternoon congratulated the country on the advances made toward sustaining the honor and good faith of the country. It seems to me his congratulation would have been more applicable had it been directed to the bondholders for their advances upon the interests of the tax-payers, of the aggressions of the creditors of the country over the labor and industry of the country.

We are told by the chairman of the Finance Committee that it is only intended as a declaration of policy; but what are we to understand by this? Is it to be merely a vain and empty declaration of policy, or is it to be a solemn act of Congress, a declaration of law, which is to be binding upon us? It seems to me the latter will be its force and effect if it passes.

Perhaps it is well that this question should be disposed of without further delay, in order that the people may know with some degree of certainty the weight of burden upon them. If they really owe the whole $2,556,000,000 in gold coin, as the passage of this section will indicate, or the equivalent of that sum in currency, amounting at the present rate to about thirty-three hundred and fifty millions, the sooner it is proclaimed the better. It can be of no advantage to the people to fondle a delusion, however pleasant, which must finally cost them hundreds of millions. It is customary to speak of the national debt as about two and a half billions, but if we owe the whole of this $2,556,000,000 in gold dollars we actually owe about three and a third billions, as we usually estimate money.

If, as is alleged, it will improve our credit to put forth the statement that our national debt is three and one third billions, I am sure there is no rule by which that proposition can be demonstrated, and the result must depend upon a trial for its proof. I believe the hope is rather to the opinion and the latter a most illegitimate production.

With an acknowledged indebtedness of $2,556,000,000, honored in all respects according to the strict letter of the obligation, our securities are worth less than seventy-five cents on the dollar, can it be said that by largely increasing the indebtedness, as this proposition virtually does, our credit will be improved? However clear this may seem to the bondholder it has not yet been made so to the debtor. The people will never take that view of the case. An insolvent whose available assets are unequal to his obligations, and whose credit in consequence is below par would not expect a favorable result from a similar transaction. It would take a long time for him to reestablish his credit by the process of adding voluntarily to his indebtedness. If unfortunately one is unable to meet his currency obligations he cannot improve his credit by acknowledging the indebtedness to be upon the basis of coin and by binding himself to pay all in gold. Such a step on the part of a person or firm would be regarded as rash in the extreme, and instead of improving would work an utter destruction of credit.

What is to be gained by the adoption of this proposition? It will not of itself pay a dollar of our obligations even in greenbacks, much less in gold. It will not dispense with a single exaction. The tax-gatherer will come as before and be not a whit less extortionate.

An admitted indebtedness of $3,800,000,000 will afford a better pretext, if one shall be wanting, for demanding a larger percentage on your small salary and mine. It will furnish a strong argument for increasing taxes and tariffs, which are already too high. The debtor class, the people, the labor of the country, which after all has to pay the debt, would repel this monstrous proposition at once could they be heard. The people do not nor have they ever asked by petition or otherwise for the adoption of the principle embodied in this bill, and their creditors have no shadow of right to demand it. The form and substance of the bonds are prescribed by the public laws, and in accordance with them interest is paid regularly in gold. Let their holders be content with what is nominated in their favor, lest popular impatience should eventually require the utmost exactness in taking the pound of flesh.

It is not easy to divine the real object of this proposition. The debt is either payable in gold or it is not. If it is payable in gold as the law now stands then there can be no necessity for its passage. It would only be a vain repetition of an existing fact; and any number of reiterations would not alter it. But if, on the other hand, a large portion of our debt is not payable with gold dollars it would be great injustice to the debtors to declare it so payable while any description of lawful money bears a less value, dollar for dollar, than gold. Suppose my note is in bank for $1,000; if the banker can exact of me its payment in gold, the gold being at thirty-five per cent. premium, my debt is actually $1,350, and my banker would not relieve my anxiety nor improve my ability to pay by graciously informing me that it is not due till some time hence. Such a demand, if it could ever be enforced, would tend to impair rather than improve my credit, and no sophistry could prevent that result.

Is it in a spirit of braggadocio that this declaration is sought to be enacted? Is our contempt of a burden of $2,556,000,000 so great that we ought voluntarily to shoulder about seven hundred millions more? Can we prove our ability to pay $2,550,000,000 by voluntarily, or at the dictation of our creditors, adding largely to it? To suppose so is to forget entirely that the present amount, mostly due as it is in a medium easiest to raise, weighs down our credit to a deplorable degree.

I am not unmindful of the indignation, assumed or otherwise, which bondholders manifest toward those who, like myself, believe that it is not unfair to pay in kind, if of equal or greater value, this borrowed money, and that the creditor has no right to demand coin for his greenbacks unless the contract calls for coin or unless we are paying coin when they become due; but at the same time I will not forget that the people, the many, have rights no less sacred than the fortunate few.

The $233,000,000 of 1881 bonds ought to be and unquestionably will be paid in gold, as they were mostly purchased with that commodity. In like manner the $221,000,000 of ten-forty bonds must be paid every cent in coin; for upon those terms the loan was made. But what justice or equity demands that the fifty-two securities should be paid in a different medium from that with which they were purchased, especially if that medium possessed a value far greater than it had at the date of purchase? All this loud talk about the dishonor of a refusal to respond to this extraordinary demand of the bondholder shall pass by me as the idle wind. Repudiator is one of the commonest appellations indulged in against the opponents of this measure; but that name is equally applicable to him who refuses his purse to the footpad.

I have already said that if the fifty-two bonds were really payable, as this bill attempts to declare, in coin, or its equivalent, there could be no necessity for its passage; but the very fact that the measure is brought forward is a palpable confession of the truth that they are not so payable. The letter and spirit of the law are in harmony; and these bonds should be discharged, like the ordinary and multifarious obligations of the country, in any lawful money—in gold if we are paying gold when they must be paid, and if not, then not. Should business reach a specie standard before these bonds become due, of which there is some hope provided we do not rashly forfeit our credit, as is now proposed, the holders of them would have nothing either to complain of or deplore, for they would be paid in current gold dollars. But here we are met with the statement that we are soon to reach specie payments in spite of events, and that the fifty-two bonds will in that case be paid in coin, and the passage of this bill therefore can do no harm. The fallacy of such a position is easily exposed. If we could arrive at a gold basis without much delay, and notwithstanding this proposed action the statement would possess considerable force. But some calculation is admissible to determine the effect of adding this $700,000,000 to our acknowledged indebtedness.

Before the war, when we owed but a few millions, not more than fifty or sixty, United States bonds commanded a premium of fifteen or twenty per cent.; but when that indebtedness is run up to $2,556,000,000, they are thirty-five per cent. below par. If it were increased to $3,300,000,000, they must go still lower, and we should be fortunate if we escaped financial ruin like that which overtook this Republic at an earlier period of its history. It may have escaped the attention of some who ought to remember the historical fact that millions upon millions of the old continental or sage-leaf money became utterly worthless, and very many citizens who had exchanged their property, the produce of their farms and workshops, for it were utterly ruined. It is true that as a nation we were then weak and poor, and, boasting aside, we are comparatively so still, certainly poor if we may judge from the rate our securities bear in the markets of the world. Our population was then four millions, it is now ten times that number; but if I mistake not our debt is nearly as large in proportion to population as that which our forefathers neglected to pay.

But we are told our resources are inexhaustible, and much calculation is made upon a great unknown population and boundless wealth yet undeveloped. A ready response to this is furnished in the fact that our ancestors had all the undeveloped wealth of the new world, all that has since been developed and all that will be forever hereafter, and still they flatly repudiated.

We expect to discharge our debt in full, principal and interest, down to the last cent, but it may be well to suggest to the creditor before hundreds of millions are unnecessarily added to our burdens that our fathers survived the death of the continental money, and the action of Washington and his co-peers in this regard is not even remembered against them.

The persistent effort of the bondholders to carry their point by appeals to our fears and false pride may eventually succeed, but a victory gained by such device would be no less dishonorable than the worst form of repudiation; and in my judgment far from advantageous to those who are urging it. It may result in utter discouragement of the people.

It was a great mistake in the first place to make the interest on any portion of the public debt payable in coin. The object was to tempt the cupidity of money-lenders; and it succeeded admirably; but it was a most unfortunate step for the Government. Better have resorted to more stringent taxation, or even to forced loans, than to have submitted to this exaction. Capitalists were more interested in the suppression of the rebellion than any other class of people, and their property should have been required to contribute to its overthrow without any extraordinary inducement such as gold interest or high premiums upon loans. The consent of the drafted man to render his service was never asked; he was compelled to march and to fight, and the capital of the wealthy is not more sacred than the life or limb of the poor. If "it is sweet and becoming to die for one's country," it ought to be equally agreeable to surrender a portion of one's property for the common safety. There was really no overwhelming necessity for this promise to pay interest in coin, and had half its evil results been foreseen it would never have been made. About the only public advantage I am able to see in that provision is found in the fact that it prevents the exportation of an amount of coin sufficient for that use. It is but poorly disguised, even by the able and ingenious arguments of Senators, that by far the greater portion of the coin that was in the country before the war has gone abroad, and the principal obstacle in the way of getting back to specie payments will prove to be the want of specie itself.

An unintentional confession of the need of coin in the country before its use can be resumed appears in the persistent effort of its advocates to show that a large amount is already in the country, whereas, in fact, the amount is extremely limited. One hundred million dollars—a little more or less—are in the Treasury, but not nearly as much beside, in my judgment, in the country all told. But for this requirement of coin to pay interest there would have been no necessity for even this $100,000,000 which revolves over and over in connection with the Treasury, and that, too, would have sought a foreign market. This solitary advantage, however, weighs but lightly in the balance against the disadvantages to the country from that source. The obligation to pay interest in coin presents a strong inducement for the holders of securities to depreciate their value. It is too plain to need more than the bare assertion that the lower the price of such bonds the higher will be the yield of interest on the capital invested in them. Six per cent. gold interest on a bond at par is equal to twelve per cent. when the bond is worth only fifty cents on the dollar, and nine per cent. when it is worth but seventy-five cents on the dollar. The holder of securities bearing gold interest therefore has a powerful incentive to deprecate their value in the market. He puts money in his pocket precisely in proportion as he injures the public credit.

It is impossible to tell to what precise extent men are governed by their own interests; and equally impossible to prove that the extremely low price of United States bonds all along is attributable to this cause; but I cannot withhold the belief that it has had very much to do with depressing their value. That the bondholders have it in their power to affect the public credit at any time few will deny; and the only question to consider is whether or not their interests would lead them in that direction. The reduced rates of our securities in the markets of America and Europe is a profound mystery if it cannot be ascribed to this influence. The United States six per cent. securities are hardly second to the best in the world, and ought to command a large premium; but the German banker, with an outlay of $75,000, draws his six per cent. gold interest semi-annually on $100,000, which is equivalent to nine per cent. on his capital. He at least can have no motive in building up our credit while more bonds can be purchased. By reducing it he adds to his capital and his income.

Suppose the bonds were silent as to the kind of interest to be paid, and the interest were discharged regularly in current money the same as all other obligations of the Government, the case would then be precisely the reverse. It would then stand the creditor in hand to build up the public faith. He would gain in that case by the enhanced value of the money he received as interest, and every detraction from the credit of the Government would result directly in loss to each and every bondholder.

Further argument upon this head seems superfluous, and I hasten to notice the disadvantages of recognizing a distinction between coin and the Government currency. But when this distinction is so clearly acknowledged by the Government itself as it is in paying all its ordinary obligations in paper and interest on the public debt alone in coin, the people individually cannot avoid discussing it, and comparisons are often drawn unfavorable to the public credit. This leads to frequent disparagement of the Government securities, and it turns out that these paper promises are a much better representative of the public credit than of dollars. The reputation of a Government, like that of an individual, for solvency is impaired by being much questioned.

We have long been hoping that by some means we might succeed in funding our national debt into a security bearing a less rate of interest. Plans for that end have been introduced almost without number, and the committee that reports this bill have brought forward at least one plan during this session for the funding of the public debt. But pass the bill and you will have reached the end of the question of funding the public debt. It will be utterly impossible to effect loans at a less rate of interest than that which these bonds which are already issued bear. When we agree to pay the principal and interest in gold, interest at six per cent., who will be induced by any motive you can present to take a bond at a less rate of interest? No one. The suggestion is absurd. The debt will not again be funded.

It will be remembered that the public debt affords an opportunity for a very large proportion of the capital of the country to escape taxation entirely, and as a consequence the burdens of taxation fall the heavier on the remaining property. The interest on the public debt, therefore, should be no higher than the ordinary net profits on prudently conducted business. It should in no case exceed the clear income upon money otherwise invested and subject to taxation, which, as a rule, falls far below six per cent.

Every inducement presented to capital to evade active employment is a disadvantage to the public. Its tendency is to stifle industry and retard the increase of fixed capital. And from this cause possibly it may turn out that too high an interest is disadvantageous in the long run, not only to the producing classes, but to the bondholders themselves. The best rule for all is to pay regard to the interests of all—the poor as well as the rich, to labor as well as capital, to the unfortunate as well as the fortunate. I fear the tendency of much of our legislation is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. This is not an unnatural result of the great calamity of civil war and the creation of a large creditor class in the Republic. The rich and powerful are always vigilant and active, while the poor, intent alone upon their own subsistence, are apt to overlook their rights.

But the eternal principles of justice can never be violated with impunity. While we render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsars the more humble citizen must not be neglected or forgotten.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. WELCH in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out in the first section, after the word "that," the following words:

In order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted.

And after the words "pledged to," in the eighth line, to insert:

An early resumption of specie payments by the Government, in order that conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled, and that the same may be paid in gold.

And to strike out the residue of the section, so that the section, if amended, will read:

That it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the early resumption of specie payments by the Government, in order that conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled, and that the same may be paid in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest if the Senator wants this section amended that he move to strike out all the words down to the close of the seventh line, so as to read grammatically, and then it will stand:

That the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged to the payment of the debt in coin.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not object to that. Strike out to the end of the seventh line containing the first word "that," so as to read:

That the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the early resumption of specie payments, and, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as this bill came from the House it was applicable only to the payment of bonds; it was made applicable only to interest-bearing obligations; but it has been amended by the committee here so as to strike out the words "interest-bearing," and therefore applies the pledge to payment in coin of all the obligations of the United States except those that are expressly made payable in currency. Under the operation of this amendment the pledge to pay in coin is made applicable to the United States notes, commonly called greenbacks. This part of the bill meets with my approval. I believe it is the first time that it has been proposed in Congress to declare that the greenbacks are to be paid in coin. Although logically there is nothing else in which a greenback can be paid, yet I believe it has never been sought or desired on the part of those who have been tinkering with the law upon this question to declare that the greenbacks were payable in coin.

Mr. President, if the bill shall pass in this form the faith of the Government is solemnly pledged to the payment of the currency in coin—not that the currency may be funded; not that it may be indefinitely postponed; not that it shall be allowed to run until natural causes shall improve it; but it is now proposed to pledge the faith of the Government that it shall be paid in coin.

Mr. POMEROY. That was so before.

Mr. MORTON. That was the logical result before, but it has never been so declared, and I congratulate the Committee on Finance as having taken a long step in the right direction. When this Government has given an assurance to the country that the United States notes shall be paid in coin certain duties will result from that pledge. It will then become a duty to take steps to make the pledge good and to pay these notes in coin. They are now due, over due; the bonds will not be due for years; and when we solemnly pledge the faith of this Government that they shall be paid in coin it devolves on us an immediate duty of making preparations for such payment.

If I could vote for this part of the bill without voting for the rest of it I would be glad to do so, but I cannot vote for this first section because it commits me to a definition of the contract and a construction of the law in regard to the five-twenty bonds that I do not believe to be true. This bill proposes to settle conflicting questions in regard to the interpretation of the law and to declare the true intent and meaning of the statutes creating the several classes of bonds, and providing that all of them, except those expressly made payable in currency, shall be paid in coin. I do not believe that is the law. I cannot vote for that declaration without proving false to my own convictions, and therefore I will not vote for it.

And now I propound this question: it is either intended by this bill to make a new contract, or it is not. If it is intended to make a new contract I protest against it. We should do foul injustice to the Government and to the people of the United States, after we have sold these bonds on an average for not more than sixty cents on the dollar, now to propose to make a new contract for the benefit of the holders. And therefore, if the effect of this declaration is to make a new contract, is to assume an obligation that does not now exist, I protest against it. If it does not propose to make a new contract, but simply to enforce that which now exists by law, then it is unnecessary.

Mr. President, this bill begins with a title "An act to strengthen the public credit." It is a small stump speech injected into the title of the bill. The idea that we are to strengthen the credit of the United States by this enactment would be absurd if it did not emanate from such a highly respectable quarter. That the credit of this Government is to be improved, or, in the language of this bill, is to be strengthened by a resolution, I do not believe. No, sir; that will not be the effect of it. What is the purpose of it, and what will be the effect of it? Simply to raise the price of bonds in the market and to put money into the pockets of the speculators.

Sir, it is understood, I believe, that the passage of a bill of this kind would have the effect in Europe, where our financial questions are not well understood, to increase the price of our bonds and increase the demand; and that will enable the great operators to sell the bonds they have on hand at a profit. It is in its nature a brokers' operation. It is a "bull" movement, intended to put up the price of bonds for the interest of parties dealing in them. This great interest is thundering at the doors of Congress and has been for many months, and by every means attempting to drive us into legislation for the purpose of making money for the great operators. That is what it means, and nothing else. So far as it may have any effect upon the future result, as to whether these bonds actually will be paid in coin or currency, it can have none possibly. Why, sir, do we not all know just as well as we know anything that if when the first five-twenties shall come due in 1882 our currency is still depreciated and we have not returned to specie payments we cannot pay these bonds in gold? This Government cannot procure the gold on a depreciated currency to pay these bonds. Hence, no difference what the contract may be, no difference what may be the declaration of the law, if when these bonds come due we have returned to specie payments and our currency is equivalent to gold, then we shall pay in gold or its equivalent without regard to the contract, because we shall have nothing else to pay in. So far as the final result is concerned, it makes no kind of difference what the contract is, one way or the other. If when these bonds come due we have returned to specie payments we shall have nothing to pay with but gold or its equivalent. If we shall not have returned to specie payments we cannot pay in gold; we must either pay in currency or not pay at all.

What good is to be obtained by this declaration so far as the final result is concerned? Absolutely nothing. Why, sir, here is an exception in the bill that is wholly unnecessary.

Except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money.

That exception is of no importance at all, because when we come to specie payments our lawful money will be equivalent to coin. Therefore we will pay those bonds in just the same money that we will pay others that are provided expressly to be paid in coin. Then, Mr. President, why this higgling about the contract? It cannot possibly affect the future result. It is therefore for the present. It is simply for speculative purposes, and for no others.

Mr. President, I confess my surprise that the same committee that brought forward the bill which we discussed the other day, and which, I believe, died a natural death in this body, should now indorse this one. What was the purpose of that bill? It was to provide that the surplus gold now in the Treasury, and that which is hereafter to accrue through the form of gold notes, should be applied to the purchasing of these securities in the market at the market price. Of course it was the interest of the Government to get those bonds, when it came to buy them thus, at as low a price as possible; but here is a bill the object of which is to put up the price of those bonds in the market so that the Government would have to pay more for them. I disagreed to that policy, because I said it was bad faith—and I desire to repeat that statement here to-night—to take the gold in the Treasury and use it for the purpose of buying up bonds that would not become due for years, instead of applying it to the payment of obligations that are now due and which we are bound to pay in coin or not at all.

But, sir, while it is contended one day that we shall take our gold and buy up these bonds in the market and let the currency go, by the next bill the attempt is made to raise the price of these bonds in the market, and thereby increase the cost for which we will get them. As has been stated here to-night, if this bill passes all prospect of funding the public debt until we return to specie payments has passed away. When you have declared that a six per cent. bond is to be paid in gold, and you give the public a general assurance of that kind, will you expect the holder of that bond voluntarily to give it up and take a four and a half per cent. bond? No, sir; all prospect of funding the debt after the passage of this bill must be put by until we return to specie payments.

When do the Committee on Finance expect to return to specie payments? According to the bill we had before us the other day there was a theory for that; there was a mode of returning to specie payments; and that was that the currency was not to be brought to par until the five per cent. bonds were brought to par—until the bonds bearing the lowest rate of interest and the last ones to get to par had been bought up. Why, sir, it would take ten or fifteen years, perhaps, to accomplish that. The currency was put behind the whole bonded debt, according to the theory of that bill. Although that bill has perished its friends have not given it up; and here is a bill that says substantially to the country, all ideas of funding must be put away until we have returned to specie payments.

Now, sir, after we return to specie payments we can fund the debt. How? We can take a bond drawing as low a rate of interest as it will sell for at par in gold, take the gold and redeem the six per cent. bonds, and by repeating that operation we can fund the debt. But you cannot sell a new bond bearing a low rate of interest at par in gold until you return to specie payments. Therefore, returning to specie payments is the condition precedent for the whole operation. The idea has been cherished—I confess I never thought very well of it, but I know it was the idea of the Committee on Finance—that we might fund the debt in a four and a half per cent. bond. I believe we passed a bill through the Senate, and I think I voted for it, providing that we should offer the bondholders a four and a half per cent. bond. We did not say whether the existing bonds should be paid in gold or not, but we left them to understand that perhaps they would be paid in greenbacks, and it was thought that that would be an inducement for exchanging the existing bonds for this new bond that was expressly payable in gold. That bill passed the Senate upon that very idea. But even that poor chance of funding is now expressly discarded by this bill.

Mr. President, I regarded the other bill as a bill for the benefit of the speculators. This bill is unmistakable in its character; it is a bill for the benefit of those who are operating in bonds and who expect to profit largely even by a small rise in them. That it can have any ultimate effect on the final result as to whether the bonds shall be paid in gold or not is utterly impossible. That does not depend upon the law at all. It depends upon the simple fact of our ability and our condition at that time. If in 1882 we have returned to specie payments we shall then pay our bonds in gold, but if at that time we have not returned to specie payments we cannot pay them in gold; it makes no difference how many declarations we make on that subject. When you return to specie payments you have nothing to pay any of your bonds with but gold or its equivalent, and therefore the exception here in favor of bonds expressly in currency is utterly worthless, because we shall have nothing then but gold and silver with which to pay those bonds.

Why, then, Mr. President, at this late hour of the session is this bill so earnestly pressed? I do not doubt the patriotism of those who are urging it; but that its only effect can be to improve the present value of the bonds in the market, and put money into some men's pockets, is clearly manifest. The provision in it that the greenbacks are specifically payable in coin I regard as valuable, if it is put in to mean anything. If it is put in as a mere placebo, for the purpose of getting votes and allaying the apprehension in the public mind, it means nothing and will not be acted upon. But if we mean what we say, that this currency is specifically payable in coin, then we should begin the preparation to pay it in coin. And how shall we do it? By collecting the gold to do it. You cannot pay the debt unless you have got the money to pay it. You cannot pay the greenbacks in gold unless you have the gold. But we are told we cannot get the gold to pay $350,000,000 of greenbacks; and yet we are required solemnly to pledge ourselves to pay $2,200,000,000 of bonded debt in coin. When we ask for the redemption of the currency in coin we are told it is impossible. The Government cannot get gold enough to do it; and yet the same Senators turn round and ask us to pledge the faith of the Government solemnly to pay $2,200,000,000 of bonded debt in gold. Sir, as the payment of these bonds in gold does not depend upon the form of the contract, but depends entirely upon the future condition of the country, why should we be higgling about this contract? This bill ought not to pass. It is tinkering with the law, not to strengthen the public credit, not for the permanent good of the country, but for the benefit of men who are dealing in bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate seem to manifest impatience, and I thought nothing in the world could tempt me at this late hour of the night to say a word upon this bill, but the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Indiana are so extraordinary that I deem it my duty to reply, and if it were night or morning I would do it alike.

The Senator seems to attack with great violence the Committee on Finance ever since we had the misfortune to disagree with him in regard to his plan to promote the public credit and resume specie payments. We were not able to report in favor of it, but reported against it, and ever since that time everything that we have done seems to meet his disfavor. He says the plan reported by us is dead, still-born. I suppose he killed the bill, according to his idea. Let me inform the Senator from Indiana that every word and every clause in the bill introduced by the Committee on Finance, in my judgment, will be the law of the land within twelve months from this time. This bill contains one section of it; and I have no doubt that all the other features of that bill will be embodied in the law of the land. If we could have had a vote of the Senate upon it, probably by this time it would have received the sanction of the Senate; but everyone saw the impatience of Congress, the hesitation and delay, and unwillingness to settle this question on broad principles.

The bill that is sent to us from the House of Representatives is not a bill of my own choosing. So far as it goes I approve of it; so far as it meets my views I approve of it. What does it contain? The remarkable declarations now made by the Senator from Indiana to cast reproach on this bill will attract attention. What is the bill? The second section of it has been often debated and has twice passed this body. What is the first section? It does not contain a single thing except the preamble, or in the nature of a preamble, but what the Senator himself advocated. He proposed the resumption of specie payments in two years, and then every dollar of this debt became payable in gold. According to his plan the people were to hoard the greenbacks and the United States were to hoard the gold, and by this process we were to get back to specie payments; and because not a single member of the Committee on Finance could see any virtue in this remedy of his therefore everything that we do meets with his disapprobation.

Mr. MORTON. I enter my protest against the declaration of the Senator that I have attacked the committee. I have not. I have imputed nothing wrong to the committee. I attribute to them nothing but patriotism and the desire to do what is for the best interests of the country. But, sir, I have attacked their measures; and I suppose I have the right to do that without having it regarded as personal. Certainly for the distinguished chairman of that committee I entertain nothing but profound respect. But so far as the measures of that committee are concerned they are public property. Now, sir, in regard to the bill—

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I have given way long enough.

Mr. MORTON. Just one word. The Senator stated that I intimated that I had killed the bill. Did I say one word like that?

Mr. SHERMAN. About the same thing.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I intimated nothing of the kind. I did not refer to the fact that I had said one word about the bill, but I did say it died a natural death, and who can dispute it? I did not say it was murdered by me or by anybody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I dispute it. It is not only not dead, but it liveth and will be the law of the land; and you here in this bill will make one of the most important and fundamental provisions, the first section of that bill, the law of the land, and I suppose that every section of it will be hereafter made the law of the land. Now, in justice to the Committee on Finance let me state what those sections were, because one of the organs of this body cannot sit here quietly and hear its measures thus arraigned at any time, in the night or in the morning, without a reply. What were the measures of that bill? The first was that gold contracts should be legalized. Here it is in this bill. The second was that $140,000,000 should be set aside to redeem the public debt, and that will be done unquestionably. Now, more than that is set aside, but it is not applied because the law is not put in force. The third was to tie the fate of the greenbacks to the fate of the bonds. That is done here by the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, so as to put the bond and the note precisely on the same footing, both to be paid in gold, both to be treated alike; and I have no doubt whatever that at the next session of Congress the demand of the public as well as the sense of justice of Congress will compel us to authorize the holder of the greenback to receive his bond, dollar for dollar, for his paper money; there is no doubt of it.

What else? The other section of the bill, the only material one, was a section which provides for free banking. The Senator himself professed to be in favor of it. He himself desired and voted to withdraw from all the eastern States nearly or more than one half of their circulation with a view to place it in the South, and then to compensate the East by free banking. Those were the provisions of the bill from the Committee on Finance, and there was not one of them that I think the honorable Senator himself would not approve.

But now this bill came to us from the House of Representatives, and I will state very briefly what it is, for I know it is wrong for me to delay the action or vote of the Senate upon it. What is the first section of this bill? It is simply a solemn pledge of the United States that all the obligations of the United States, notes and bonds, shall be paid in gold and silver coin, except only those where the law expressly provides that they shall be paid in lawful money. But my honorable friend says, why the exception? It shows that he has not examined this question with his usual care or he would not have asked that question. Why, sir, there are some fifty or sixty million dollars of three per cent. certificates expressly payable in currency. If they were not excepted from this declaration they would to-morrow be payable in coin on demand at the Treasury of the United States. Therefore this exception is made. There are also bonds issued to the railroads expressly payable in currency. But for this exception they would be paid principal and interest in gold. The interest on those bonds is semi-annually paid in lawful money. It was necessary to except certain currency obligations. But we say that with regard to all other obligations, paper money and bonds, they shall be paid in gold and silver coin.

Now, sir, the first part of this section I should like to see the Senate strike out, because it makes the declaration clearer, stronger, and more emphatic than I wish. Why? I do not believe, and I never could reason myself into the belief, that the law which authorized the issue of these bonds made a discrimination against the lawful-tender money of the United States. I think so yet; and I do believe now that by a fair and reasonable construction of those laws the bonds of the United States might be paid in lawful money issued within the limits and according to the terms of those laws. But do we propose to pay those bonds in lawful money? Certainly not. We have not the money to pay them. We dare not increase the taxes in order to gather in this lawful money to pay the bonds. We must postpone the payment of the bonds. I repeat that under the condition of our finances it is impossible to pay any considerable sum of the principal of this public debt either in lawful money or in gold. Our people do not and will not ask us to levy more taxes upon them in order to avail themselves of the legal privilege or right which they have to pay in lawful money.

My honorable friend from Wisconsin was talking about taxes. According to his doctrine he would have us levy more taxes in order to gather in this lawful money so as to avail ourselves of the legal privilege to pay the bonds in lawful money. That is his idea. Sir, the people of the United States do not desire now to pay any more of the principal of this public debt than one per cent., a small amount, and to adopt a policy which will in the end pay the whole of it. But what shall we do in the mean time? Shall we suspend specie payment until we can pay the whole of this debt by taxes? Is that the policy of the gentleman? Is the payment in specie to be postponed indefinitely? My friend from Indiana says only for two years, and then he would bring it about by hoarding gold and by hoarding greenbacks.

Do our Democratic friends propose to postpone the resumption of specie payments until this debt matures, until we can gather in a sufficient amount of taxes to pay off the principal of the debt in lawful money? No, sir. The honor of the country, the good faith of the nation, the public interest of the laborer, the rich and the poor, all classes demand that we should resume specie payments as early as possible and place all the obligations of the people of the United States upon the solid basis of gold and silver coin. We cannot delay that primary duty; and therefore I look upon this first section as simply a declaration that we will now perform our primary duty of making our notes equal to coin, and I have no doubt that if that policy is pursued and adopted the bondholder will be glad to get the lawful money of the United States in payment of his bond. But now all that this first section does is to declare as a matter of public policy that the notes and the bonds shall alike be paid in gold; the bonds as they gradually mature, and the notes long before any of the bonds mature. Why, sir, none of these bonds mature until 1881, and we cannot get the lawful money to redeem them even at the end of five years, when we have the right to redeem them, except by taxes. We cannot draw in the lawful money of the United States except by taxation. We cannot adopt the repudiating scheme of our Democratic fellow-citizens of the United States of issuing broadcast in violation of law a large amount of legal tenders and thus repudiating our debt. I never could see how honest men could propose that. Then, the only way we can get lawful money to pay this debt is by taxation, and our people will endure no more than they are now paying. They have no desire to assume all the burdens of paying the public debt now. They are willing to see a portion of it postponed, but in the mean time we cannot prolong this suspension of specie payments until we can avail ourselves of that privilege.

I say, then, that the primary duty of the United States is to resume specie payments as rapidly as possible and make the lawful money of the United States equivalent to gold. Therefore I look to see the bonds of the United States advancing step by step with the money of the United States to the par of gold. Sir, it gave me a thrill of pleasure when I saw that the bonds of the United States are now worth eighty-nine cents in gold in the markets of London. I do not care who made money by it; God knows I did not. I have no interest in it directly or indirectly. I was glad to see our bonds appreciate in the market, and that the holders should get the benefit of that appreciation; and I trust that in three or four or six months, or a year, these bonds will touch par in gold.

But my honorable friend from Wisconsin comes back and says, how can you fund the public debt? I will tell him. We will do it just as England and just as every other country did that reduced the rate of interest. Whenever the bonds of the United States rise above par in gold then we can place in the money market of the world a bond bearing a lower rate of interest. If our bonds this day had reached the par of gold we could put in the market without question or difficulty a bond bearing a lower rate of interest. Sir, I believe that if we would now wisely and persistently, firmly and boldly, march to the resumption of specie payments in such a way as not to distress our people, not by increasing taxes, but by steadily appreciating our public credit until the five per cent. bonds rise to par in gold, the whole of the six per cent. bonds could be paid off. There is now only about fifteen per cent. difference between the market value of the ten-forty bonds and gold. If we can wipe out that fifteen per cent. by an appreciation of the public credit then your funding will go on with rapid speed; the whole of the five-twenty bonds will be paid off.

Why, sir, when the bonds of England rose to one hundred and three per cent., three per cent. above par in gold, then it was that they reduced the rate of interest one per cent. by putting a bond at a lower rate of interest in the money market. That is the only way that you can carry out a process of funding. In my judgment it is the most rapid way. If we were able to gather in taxes more rapidly, if we were able to levy upon our people a larger amount of taxes and apply fifty or one hundred million dollars to the payment of the principal we could carry on the process just so much the more rapidly, but we dare not extend our system of taxation without losing the confidence of the people. The only other resort is to advance our public credit, to elevate our bonds from the slough of despond in which they were cast by the burden of the war, to elevate our public credit to where it was before the war, and then the burden of this interest will pass away by the reviving credit of our country, and we may hope to see our bonds bearing in the money market of the world, in the hands of the rich and the poor, the foreign and the native, all the credit that now clusters around the three per cent. consolidated debt of England. Then it may be that we will not satisfy ourselves by reducing the rate of interest to five but to four and a half or four per cent.; and probably within twenty or thirty years we may stand as Great Britain does with our credit such that we can get par for our bonds at three and a half per cent. interest in gold.

But, sir, in the mean time we must not be diverted from the difficulties that stand in our way. In my judgment the plan reported here at this session by the Committee on Finance is the best, the most rapid, and the most effectual way to bring about this state of affairs. I am not discouraged by the reluctance of the Senate to assume it. I know that such propositions are always of slow growth. But I assure my honorable friend from Indiana that if he supposes that any section or line or word of that currency bill is dead, or even that it sleeps, he is very much mistaken. He will find it either in whole or in part meeting him at every stage of this progress until every word of it is ingrafted in the laws of the United States.

I know that my friend, for whom I have the utmost kindness and the greatest good feeling, did not intend any unkindness in the remarks he made; but when he attacks an organ of this body, and speaks of me as the chairman of that committee, and accuses them of being guilty of vacillation and mutations and changes in their reports of bills, as a matter of course he naturally excites a feeling which will not submit in quiet to that imputation.

Sir, I myself came with slow reluctance to the declaration made in the first section of this bill. I declare now to you here that my construction of the law under which these five-twenty and under which the greenbacks were issued still remains unalterable; for I have examined it carefully again at the present session; but I do assert, as a question of public policy, that it is wise now for us to declare in the language of this bill that the bonds and greenbacks alike shall be paid in gold as rapidly as we can do so; that these greenbacks and these bonds may be linked together in every law that is passed; that every privilege that is given to the bondholder shall be given to the holder of the greenback; that both together shall rise gradually to the par of gold, when the bondholder may be paid off by bonds bearing a lower rate of interest and with a large saving of interest to the people of the United States in that most oppressive form of our expenditure.

I again beg the pardon of the Senate; and for being excited—I do not think I am excited—but for being aroused to occupy a few moments of their time at this late hour of the evening. I think this question has been fully considered, and I hope, therefore, that without any more debate on the subject to-night we may have a vote upon it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall occupy but a moment in reply to the honorable Senator from Ohio. He began in the fore part of his speech by saying, and he concludes by saying, that the five-twenty bonds by the fair construction of the law and the contract are payable in greenbacks. Now, sir, I take him at his word. By the law of the case the principal of these five-twenty bonds is not payable in gold, but in greenbacks; and the question that I put home to the Senator from Ohio is this: if the principal of nearly two thousand millions of bonds are payable in greenbacks by the fair construction of the law, as he has often said and now repeats as his deliberate opinion, can you now justly force the people of the United States to pay them in gold without a violation of the contract in letter and in spirit? If the contract to which the great mass of this people are pledged is to discharge those bonds in greenbacks, which are only worth seventy-five cents on the dollar, can any man who takes that view of the law of the case, who says that is the true construction of the law under which the bonds were issued, stand before the American people and say "You are bound to pay them in gold?" No, sir; no man can give that construction to the law and consistently vote for this bill. You must either stand upon the law, that the true construction is that the people were bound to pay the principal in gold or that they were bound to pay them in greenbacks; and if they are allowed to pay them in greenbacks, you cannot, without inflicting injustice upon the people of the United States, now say that they shall pay them in gold.

Mr. WILSON. May it not be their interest to do that very thing?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts asks me is it not the interest of the people of the United States to pay in gold when they have only agreed to pay in greenbacks? No, sir. It makes about eight hundred million dollars difference in the amount of their public debt. It adds that amount to the debt if you take the whole debt; but if you refer simply to the five-twenty bonds, it adds about one fourth to their amount.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am arguing now with the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and replying to his speech, and if my honorable friend from Vermont will wait until I have replied to him, if he then makes a speech I may reply to that, though I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate further.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Senator misstated the fact entirely with reference to the amount of these bonds, I wished to call his attention to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am dealing with the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but you are misstating facts.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The chairman of the Committee on Finance admits here, and repeats it twice solemnly, after a full examination of the law at this session, that these bonds are payable in the lawful currency of the country, or the greenbacks; and yet he stands here urging the Senate of the United States to declare that the people who may discharge these bonds in greenbacks, which are worth seventy-five cents on the dollar, shall discharge them in gold at a hundred cents on the dollar.

Now, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio says, while he gives that construction to the contract, the difficulty is to know where can you get the greenbacks? He asks, will you adopt the repudiating scheme of the Democratic party, and issue an unlimited amount of greenbacks equal to the amount of bonds? Nobody ever proposed anything like that.

Mr. STEWART. Pendleton did.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, he did not. The gentleman says Pendleton did. Even Mr. Pendleton, who went further than any other man on this subject of issuing greenbacks, distinctly, and over and over again in the canvass repudiated as false the declaration that he was in favor of issuing an unlimited amount of greenbacks in order to discharge these bonds; and I can say for myself—and I believe for the great mass of those who acted with me in supporting for President Mr. Seymour in the last canvass—the large majority of them everywhere maintained that the law under which the greenbacks were issued limited the amount of greenbacks to the amount of $450,000,000. I stand upon the law. I am not for repudiating it in favor of the bondholder, nor am I for repudiating it in favor of the tax-payer. I stand upon it as it was made. I take the construction of it that the Senator from Ohio gives it, and in this argument I hold him to that construction. I assume, therefore, they are payable in greenbacks, and not in gold.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire not to be interrupted when I am dealing with an important subject of this sort.

Mr. STEWART. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator. I only wished to ask him how he was going to pay them in greenbacks?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will come to that in a moment. The honorable Senator from Ohio asks, where will you get the greenbacks?

Mr. MORTON. Where will you get the gold?

Mr. STEWART. Let him answer first where he will get the greenbacks.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio had given his attention to the important letter which I read in the Senate to-night he would have had no difficulty on that subject in seeing just how it could be done. That letter was from a member of the same house in London that negotiated the first six per cent. stocks of the United States which funded our original debt, the house which eliminated the scheme and put it in operation.

Mr. STEWART. Tell us how it was done.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will be quiet for a moment, I will repeat the substance of the letter. It was in substance this: that the Government of the United States should issue its stocks for four and a half per cent.; that upon that stock seventy-five per cent. in sterling could be realized, and with your seventy-five per cent. in gold you could obtain your greenbacks, which are worth seventy-five cents in gold upon the nominal par, and then with your greenbacks you could pay the principal of these five-twenties which have become payable under the law.

But the Senator says there are not as many greenbacks as there are bonds. That is very true; but what did you get for your bonds? You got these same greenbacks and nothing else. They were paid over and over and over again; and you can go into the markets of the world, at home or abroad, and with a four and a half per cent. stock pledging the Government to pay principal and interest in gold you can raise the gold and exchange that gold for greenbacks, and with the greenbacks discharge a portion of the public debt; and you would not be compelled to go further than to pay one or two hundred million dollars of the principal of these bonds in greenbacks before every holder of your five-twenties bonds would gladly accept a four and a half per cent. bond, or a four per cent. bond payable principal and interest in gold in lieu of his present six per cent. five-twenties bond. That is the substance of the proposition of the man who represents the very house in London that negotiated the first debt of the Government of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. The proposition, then, is to compel the bondholders to agree to a repudiation of twenty-five per cent of their bonds by searing them into taking bonds of less value.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am interrupted by the Senator from Nevada to say—

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to allow me one moment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. As I am anxious to get through this debate in time to-night to make proper preparations for church to-morrow morning, and as I find by a rule of the Senate that it is out of order for any Senator to interrupt another while speaking, I give notice that from this time forward I shall call any one to order that interrupts the speaker.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is out of order to interrupt a Senator on the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I shall not do it again.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Nevada interrupts me to say that we propose to the bondholder to repudiate one fourth of the debt. We propose no such thing. We propose to pay the debt according to the letter and spirit of the law. The Senator from Ohio, to whom I am replying, expressly declares to the Senate, speaking for himself, that by the fair construction of the law we are not pledged to pay anything but greenbacks. We are not pledged to pay the gold; and therefore it is not repudiation. I say to the Senator from Nevada that if that be the fair construction of the contract that the people are bound only to pay these bonds in the lawful money of the country, which is worth but seventy-five cents on the dollar, you are for repudiating the contract; you are the repudiator; you would tax the people one hundred cents where by the law of the contract you only have the right to tax them seventy-five. I brand your proposition as repudiation; repudiation, and nothing but repudiation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair and not each other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I stand upon the contract as the Senator from Ohio admits it to be; and you have no more right to repudiate it so as to bring heavier burdens upon the people than you have to repudiate it in order to destroy the real and just obligation which the bondholder has against the Government. The bondholder has his obligation worth seventy-five cents on the dollar in gold, as it now stands, and no more; and you propose to put this additional burden of twenty-five per cent. on the people of the United States. You repudiate the contract. We agreed to pay a dollar in paper money, not a dollar in gold.

Sir, this cry that it is our purpose to repudiate the just obligations of the Government is a false cry from the beginning to the end. We stand for the contract. You are for repudiating it. You began by repudiating the old contracts when you passed your legal-tender law. You made the paper money issued under that law a legal tender in payment of contracts already in existence as well as a legal tender for contracts in futuro. You declared that you would allow a contract which a man had solemnly engaged to pay in gold to be discharged in paper money.

Mr. President, I confess that I feel some interest in pleading in this case. I am not pleading, I admit, for the bondholders or the bond-purchasers in Wall street or London or elsewhere, but I am pleading for the great mass of the people of this country who have to bear the burdens, who have to pay these bonds and pay the interest upon them. You admit that they are only bound to pay seventy-five cents on the dollar; that they have the right to discharge them in the lawful money of the country, which is only worth that amount at the present time, and yet you propose to force upon them the necessity of meeting these obligations at one hundred cents on the dollar in gold.

I should not have spoken again on this subject but for the fact that the Senator from Ohio charged me with favoring repudiation, when upon his own ground he is for repudiation and I am for standing by the contract.

Mr. MORTON. One word further, sir. My friend, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, spoke with some asperity. I do not think he had occasion to do so, but I do not complain of it. I simply desire to call attention at the conclusion of this debate to the fact that the main position that I took he has not answered and did not even approach. I took the ground that if when these bonds became due the Government had not returned to specie payments and our paper money was still depreciated the Government could not pay the bonds in gold, and that when we had returned to specie payments and our paper currency was convertible into gold then we would have nothing but gold or its equivalent to pay, and therefore the particular form of the contract was unimportant; that this change that he proposes to make in the contract could not affect the final result, and therefore the only object of it was to affect the present price of the bonds. That was my position; and with all his knowledge and ingenuity he did not even approach it.

I might also refer to what has been referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin, that he distinctly admits in his speech, as he has done perhaps upon a dozen occasions in the Senate, that according to the law of the contract the Government has the right to pay the five-twenties bonds in legal-tender notes. He admits that here to-night; but he presents a bill that proposes to make a new contract for the Government of the United States by declaring that the faith of the Government is pledged to pay in coin a bond which he admits by the terms of the original contract may be paid in legal-tender notes. Let it be understood then that according to the confession of the chairman of the committee this bill is intended to make a new contract. Long after these bonds have been sold and long after they have been taken upon the old contract it is now proposed to make a new contract. For whose benefit? Not for the benefit of the Government of the United States; but to enable the men who deal in bonds to realize a rise upon them and a speculation. It is a new contract, because if the old contract is, as he says it is, and as he has always declared it to be, he now proposes to change it and say that the Government has not got the right to pay in legal-tender notes, but is bound to pay in coin.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will my colleague allow me to suggest to him—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to order. He has no right to interrupt the Senator on the floor. Notice has been given that that rule would be enforced.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not interrupting my colleague; I am asking my colleague if he will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I addressed the Chair before the Senator did, and I think I was recognized.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Maine wishes to speak I certainly do not wish to be in his way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going to suggest to my colleague, with his permission, before he took his seat, that this will not be the making of a new contract, for there is no new consideration passing as between the people and the persons who hold the public securities. It is an effort simply at a legislative construction of the law and the contract already made; and if it be competent for this Legislature to put a construction upon the contract it is equally competent for a future Legislature to put another construction upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to answer the question my colleague asked me, and then I will give way to him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If every question is to be asked in the form of a speech and to be answered by a speech I do not see that I shall get a chance to speak at all.

Mr. MORTON. I certainly give way to the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate will excuse me at this late hour of the night in saying a word or two I very much desire to do so, because I have heard doctrines advanced here to-day and this evening to which I cannot assent; and as I was somewhat intimately connected with the enactment of this law which has been so much commented upon I feel a little interest in it, that it should not be totally misunderstood and totally perverted.

The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] in the speech that he made this forenoon, undertook to say that the policy adopted by the Republican party, who passed the bill, was originally to depreciate our money; that they passed that bill with the design of issuing a depreciated currency and having it depreciated upon the market for the uses of the time. Sir, the Senator draws upon his imagination and not upon any fact when he makes that statement. That the money did become depreciated in consequence of the continuance of the war and the great expenses to which this country was subjected is true; but that it was the deliberate design or the dream of those who passed the bill to make a depreciated currency purposely I utterly deny. There is not a word of real foundation for the statement.

Mr. President, what were the circumstances under which we authorized the issuing of these notes? Senators will remember that gold had gone out of the market. Senators will remember that it was no longer in the power of the Government to obtain the gold. It was necessary that they should have some currency in which to collect the taxes which they were about to levy, and something which could pass as money for all the uses of the war. It was with that design that they issued their promises to pay; and it is a foul reproach upon the character of this people and of Congress to say or to intimate that when they issued a currency, their own promises, in which they engaged to pay so many dollars to the holder, they meant to pay less than so many dollars to the holder. They guarded against the possibility of it, or endeavored to do so, in every way that they could imagine to be feasible.

What did they do? They provided that that money thus issued, those promises, might at any time be turned into a bond; and that bond should promise to pay so many dollars with so much interest, and that that interest was to be paid in gold. I will explain presently the distinction between the principal and the interest which existed. Was it the design that that should be depreciated paper? Was it the design that it should fall in the market, that less was to be paid for it than the promise that it bore on its face? Did they mean, when they said they would pay one dollar, that they intended to pay only sixty or seventy cents? Was that the object? The men of those States and the Senator himself, had he been here, would have repudiated the very idea as a reproach and a scandal; and for a Senator of the United States to rise here in his place to-day and say to the country and the world that the people of the United States, by their representatives, when they issued their promises to pay, did it with the design of defrauding the public, I say again is without the slightest foundation in fact. Sir, I meant what I said, and the Congress of the United States meant what it said, that it would pay so many dollars. What was a dollar? A dollar was defined by statute. It was gold or silver coin. That was the promise; and a promise which I for one meant to perform; and a promise which the people of the United States, through their representatives, meant to perform.

Now, sir, having alluded to that, I desire to say one word about another point, for I do not design to go into the argument. I utterly protest against the idea that two Senators in this body—the honorable Senator from Indiana

[Mr. MORTON] and the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHEPHERD,] the chairman of the Committee on Finance—shall be held as representing the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States on this subject because their opinions happen to be one way. Why, sir, this matter has been argued by the two Senators, and is argued by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, as if the words of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio were law to all the people of this country and to all the representatives of the people. I do not hold them to be law to me. The Senator from Indiana talks about making a new contract. Sir, it is no new contract. He assumes that as the basis of his argument. I deny it. It is the old contract.

Mr. MORTON. I assumed that on the admission of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And on the Senator's own admission, for he made a speech here at the last session of Congress in which he laid down the same doctrine; and I understood him to say at the time, very distinctly, that no man who was a lawyer could dispute the fact; and I undertook to dispute the fact at the time in so many words. He may be of the same opinion still; but it does not bind me.

Mr. MORTON. I never said that. You cannot find any such statement made by me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps not, in so many words.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator cannot find it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I could. That was the idea. I am very positive about that. It struck me at the time. It might have been that no man of common sense would do it; but that would be a little more offensive, and I do not think the honorable Senator said that.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And the honorable Senator from Ohio, in the report that he brought in from the Committee on Finance, undertook to say substantially the same thing, that that was his construction of the statute, but did he represent the Committee on Finance in that? I understood not; that he represented simply his own opinions; and however much I may defer to his opinions, and however much respect I may have for him, and I certainly have a great deal, as I have for the honorable Senator from Indiana, I wish to say to them that they cannot get up here and argue one another and let anybody else found an argument that because they think so therefore everybody else must think so; and yet that is really the style of argument that is adopted as between themselves, that they are to settle this question, and because they have given these opinions one is reproaching the other and holding him to it as if that was the conclusion of the country and of Congress. Sir, I undertake to say that if gentlemen accustomed to construe statutes will take the most ordinary, the best received rule of construction, and take that statute as a whole, there is no doubt about what the construction must be, and that is that the principal as well as the interest was to be paid in coin.

Gentlemen found themselves on this, and that is all the argument there is, because by the words of a section the interest simply is mentioned as to be paid in coin, it not being said that the principal is, therefore, as a matter of necessity, the principal is not. Sir, take all the statute together; construe it as a judge does; construe it as a lawyer does; find out what the meaning of the law is. I undertake to say that that construction would render the statute ridiculous and perfectly absurd on the face of it. What does it propose? It says that any man who has a given amount of these greenbacks, as they are called, may carry them at any time to the Treasury and take out a bond redeemable after five years and payable in twenty, bearing interest payable in coin. You must take that statute by itself, not as construed by other statutes, and what would be the result as a matter of fact? Why, sir, if the bond is payable in greenbacks which you have just received, the result is all a person has to do who has one of those bonds is to go to the Treasury and receive his greenbacks for it; if it may be paid in greenbacks; and then he steps over to the other side after he has got his greenbacks and demands another bond, precisely the same thing on the same day, within any five minutes; and thus he keeps alternating from one side of the Treasury Department to the other, going and getting greenbacks for a bond, if it is payable in greenbacks; and then going over to another part of the building and getting a bond for it redeemable after five years and payable in twenty. Mind you, the statute which repealed that clause authorizing the demand of the bond for greenbacks was not passed until afterward; and when you are construing a contract arising upon a statute you cannot take a construction that is made upon a part of it afterward by a subsequent statute; you must take it by itself. Sir, the whole idea always struck me as a perfect absurdity on the face of the statute itself. It was sticking in a word against the whole spirit and the whole meaning of that law. I will not argue it over at length, because it is too late at night. I rose to enter my protest against this debate going out to the country between Senators who have expressed these opinions previously and who occupy high positions in this body as the sense of the body. It is not the sense of the body, as I take it the vote of to-night will demonstrate, if we ever get to a vote on this subject.

Now, sir, what does the honorable Senator from Wisconsin propose as a means of getting out of this difficulty and paying off our debt? That we shall issue our bonds and go into a foreign market and borrow gold; that we shall then come into this market with the gold and buy up our depreciated paper and pay off our old six per cent. bonds; that we shall trade in that way and settle our debts in that way? Sir, what would be thought of a private individual, a merchant, if he dealt in that way? Would you not call him a knave? Would you not say he was a cheat? Would you trust him? Would you have any confidence in his contract? Would you sell him a chest of tea or a bushel of corn? It is nothing but flat knavery; it is flat cheating; nothing more nor less than that; and when that is put forth as the doctrine of the Democratic party, as a new phase of the doctrine of repudiation, which they advanced in the last canvass, and which the people repudiated, I trust it will meet the same fate. It certainly deserves it. That is the short and the long of the proposition; the plain construction of it; and unless we mean—

Mr. DIXON. Allow me to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is out of order under the notification we have received.

Mr. WILSON and others. I object.

Mr. DIXON. With the Senator's consent I will ask him a question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, ask it. I have no objection.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to ask the Senator whether it is any more knavery when propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin than the same doctrine precisely when propounded by the Senator from Indiana? Anything that comes from the Senator from Wisconsin is called Democratic.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, I stated that it was so because I did not hear the Senator from Indiana propound that doctrine, and I did hear the Senator from Wisconsin propound it; and as I have listened to the debate to-day from divers and sundry gentlemen of the Democratic party I see that this is to be their platform hereafter.

Mr. DIXON rose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not my friend's. I desire to exclude him, for he has put himself upon a proper platform. I only hope, with the company around him, he may be able to stand upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will allow me, he does not seem to hear what falls from the lips of the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Indiana. He only bears what falls from my friend from Wisconsin. The Senator was here present, I believe, at the time those Senators made their speeches. Now, with the Senator's leave—I will not go on without his consent—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] both declared in the hearing of the Senator this evening that in their judgment the law authorized the payment of the five-twenties in greenbacks; that we had a right to pay in greenbacks; that that was the contract. I think I did not misunderstand the Senators. Now, when that doctrine is propounded by those Senators, I ask my friend from Maine if it was not as dishonest and as objectionable as when it came from a Senator whom he calls Democratic?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a wonderful difference between the theory of knavery and the practice of it. That is all I have to say about that. The honorable Senators alluded to have contended and no doubt they believe that by the law of the case strictly we had a right to pay in greenbacks; but they have both placed themselves, as I understand them, on the higher plane that we ought not to pay in greenbacks, but that we ought to bring our credit up to the point and the greenbacks themselves up to the point where payment in greenbacks would be equivalent to payment in gold and a discharge of the contract.

Mr. DIXON. Does not the Senator from Wisconsin take the same ground?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; he does not take the same ground. He takes the ground, and he reads us a document to show what we ought to do, that we ought to issue our bonds at a lower rate of interest, go into the London market and get the gold, come back, buy up our greenbacks at a depreciated rate, and with those greenbacks pay off our six per cent. bonds. That is his proposition in so many words, and that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. DIXON. I will wait until the Senator gets through to reply.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am glad the Senator has concluded to wait until I get through. He cannot dispute that fact, because the Senator from Wisconsin has himself over and over again put it so this evening to my very great surprise. I characterize that now just exactly as I did before, as dishonest in its nature and essence, and that any private individual acting upon the same system would not have credit in any community or retain the reputation of an honest man. I have sufficient regard for my country to hope that it will not lose its reputation for integrity; and it certainly will whenever it resorts to any such plan of payment as that.

With regard to the bill before the Senate it meets my approbation altogether. I should like very much to have had the second section a little more definite. I voted to make it so. But with regard to the first section I never had any doubt about the true meaning of the law under which these bonds were issued. I have been with my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] from the first time he made the proposition that we should make this declaration. Why? Not that it makes a new contract, as the Senator from Indiana stated, not that it in any way places us under any new obligations, but that inasmuch as a great party in this country has taken the ground that we ought not thus to deal with our contracts, and as two very distinguished Senators in this body have taken the ground that by the true legal construction of that law we had a right so to act, I wish to dissipate all such clouds that are overshadowing the credit of this country. I wish to put it upon the broad ground that by the original contract, according to any true legal construction of it, these bonds must be paid in gold, and also upon the fact that we ourselves time and again so declared by the proper officers of this Government, with the approbation of the people, that inasmuch as we did that we now make a legislative declaration of it that we, the representatives of the people, that we at least who represent the great party which originated this debt, from the necessities of the case borrowed the money and promised to pay it, shall keep our faith intact. If Senators on the other side of the Chamber desire to go before the people again, as they say and as we may infer they mean to do, with the declaration in their mouths that we are not bound either in law or honor to pay the dollars that we promised to pay, according to the original meaning and promise, I wish the Congress of the United States to speak upon that subject and to say that until some other set of men acquire the power to rule in these halls and to make laws, we will keep the faith of this Government on the proud eminence where it has stood hitherto unshaken by any efforts that have been made willfully to break it down anywhere, unshaken even by the mistaken ideas of the contract that we entered into on the part of eminent and excellent gentlemen who are, I am sorry to see, mistaken upon a matter so vital to the welfare of the people.

My friend from Ohio, I think, began wrong when he adopted any such idea. That original error of his has tainted his excellent mind and his great knowledge of this subject all through. I am glad to see that it has not tainted his perceptions of right, and that, whatever may be his views with regard to what was the legal construction of the contract, the time has not come with him, and never will, when he wishes to avoid what is the truth and the fact in regard to it to enable the people of this country to do what they are expected to do, and that is, to discharge all their obligations in full faith and honor. This bill, this production of the Committee on Finance, now is a proof to me that all error upon that subject is fast vanishing, and that we can reach the point I have so long wished to reach, where there can be no doubt in the mind of any man in this country or elsewhere of what the people of the United States mean to do; that is, preserve their credit, keep their faith, raise the credit of this country to the point where it ought to stand, make themselves able to discharge all their obligations according to the spirit as well as the letter, and not be deluded by any idea that a party can rule here who seek to flatter and deceive the people into false notions of what constitutes public faith.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maine, it seems to me, has fallen into a very great error when he says that what I proposed to do, to pay the bonds in the legal-tender notes of the Government, is knavery; that it is not consistent with honesty to propose it. That, of course, depends upon the construction to be given to the contract. If the contract is as the Senator from Ohio and other Senators on this floor have admitted, and as I believe a fair construction of its language is, that the principal of the debt is payable in the lawful money which has been created by Congress, there is no dishonesty in discharging that debt according to its terms.

Now, Mr. President, let me bring the Senator from Maine to the point. Suppose that I as an individual had gone to him and borrowed of him $10,000 of the lawful money of the United States, the greenback currency, which at the time he loaned it to me was worth forty cents on the dollar, and I agree in consideration of the loan that I would pay him six per cent. interest in gold so long as I kept it and until I paid the debt; and when I paid the debt I should pay him in the same money which he loaned to me, and which at the time I offered to pay it to him is worth seventy-five cents on the dollar. Is that knavery? I, for six long years, have paid him six per cent. interest in gold for the loan of paper money worth but forty or fifty cents in gold, equivalent to twelve per cent. interest on the amount of gold value which he loaned to me, and then I offer to pay him the principal of the debt by giving him the value in gold, not at fifty per cent., but at seventy-five per cent. The $10,000 in currency which he loaned to me were worth $5,000 in gold. I pay him $600 per year for the use of $5,000 in gold. I pay him that sum for a term of years, and then I offer to discharge the debt by giving him $7,500 in gold or its equivalent, $10,000 in the same money which he let me have in exchange for my land; and that he says is knavery; that he says no honest man will do, and no honest man can justify himself for offering to do.

Sir, let me tell that honorable Senator that if he should appear in any court of equity, before any tribunal upon earth, and should insist upon my paying him in another kind of money than that which he loaned to me and I agreed to return to him, and should insist that I should pay him $10,000 in gold, when the contract was between him and me that I could pay the debt in $10,000 in paper money worth seventy-five cents on the dollar, every court on earth and every honest man would say that he was a usurer and a Shylock if he should undertake to enforce it against me.

The Senator talked about my repudiating the obligations of the United States. No, sir; I stand upon these obligations; and I will stand there for the benefit of the people of the United States as well as for the benefit of the bondholder. I will not be driven by the cry of repudiation from speaking the truth. I will not be driven into usury, nor into playing the part or suffer myself to aid others to play the part of Shylock, demanding not only what is nominated in the bond the pound of flesh, but good Christian blood. I will defend the rights of the people under this contract as well as the rights of the bondholder. While I oppose the idea of repudiating the debt which legally, morally, and equitably binds the Government of the United States, I repudiate as usurious and as based upon the principles of Shylock that other doctrine that would force the people to pay one hundred cents in gold where the fair construction of the contract is that they should discharge the debt in lawful money, worth from forty to sixty when borrowed, but now worth seventy-five. Sir, let us look at this thing as it is. The great mass of these bondholders let the Government of the United States have this depreciated currency at a value not exceeding sixty cents on the dollar in gold, much of it not exceeding forty cents. They have received their interest at six per cent. on $100 in gold for a term of years, and now, substantially, the proposition to which I have referred is to offer to pay them in greenbacks. Not by the issue of new greenbacks; I admit that would be a species of repudiation, and I protest against it and all idea of violating the letter or the spirit of the law on that subject; but we may use all the greenbacks that we have on hand or the greenbacks that we can purchase for gold to pay the bondholders. If we choose to borrow the gold to purchase the greenbacks there is nothing dishonorable or objectionable in that.

Sir, I made no proposition such as the Senator refers to, that we should go to the London market and there borrow gold for the purpose of purchasing greenbacks. I only read a statement of a gentleman in London who is connected with the house that negotiated the first funded debt of the United States. He states that United States bonds bearing four and a half per cent. interest, payable in gold in London, would command seventy-five cents in sterling, and with that seventy-five cents in sterling we could discharge the bonds or a portion of them. You would not be compelled to proceed in the payment of more than $100,000,000 of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks before all the holders of those bonds would exchange them for your bonds at four or four and a half per cent., payable, principal and interest, in gold; and, sir, that would be no repudiation. The way to save ourselves from repudiation is to stand by the contract; and I tell gentlemen here if you do not stand by the contract in favor of the people the people will not stand by you in enforcing any new contract that you choose to make increasing their burdens twenty-five per cent. You must stand by the contract as well for the benefit of the people who pay as you do for the people who receive the bondholders. Sir, let me read again this statement from the London gentleman, that Senators may see whether it is liable to the attack which the Senator from Maine has made upon it:

"In this office in the year 1793 the first scheme for the mode of discharging the principal and interest of the six per cent. stocks of the United States was first eliminated, and it was ultimately adopted and carried out by Congress. It was an accumulative interest of two per cent.

"Having been intimately connected with the funds of the individual States from that date to this time it will be readily comprehended that I have steadily followed and studied all the financial matters connected with the different loans of the United States.

"It is evident to me that a large loan in sterling money might be raised in this country, the proceeds to be applied to the payment (in greenbacks) of the six per cent. bonds known as five-twenties.

"A stock bearing four and a half per cent. interest, principal and interest payable in sterling and having an accumulative sinking fund of one and a half per cent., which would pay off the debt in thirty-one years, could be negotiated at seventy-five per cent. in sterling money, and this sum of money converted into greenbacks will pay the capital of the debt at par and leave a balance to the Treasury.

"The larger the loan the wider the basis, and the more marketable it would become.

"To make this proposition clearly understood I will suppose that a foreign holder of $10,000 of six per cent. bonds, redeemable after five years, before twenty years from date of issue, he gets $600 per annum which he sells for three shillings sterling per dollar, equal to $120 per annum; but he is in doubt if his capital may not be returned to him at any moment in greenbacks, in which case at this time the rate will be 2s. 9d. per paper dollar, equal to $137.5.

"If he can exchange his bonds in London and obtain £2,000 of four and a half per cent., true he will only get an income of ninety pounds per annum; but there he will be sure of £2,000 ultimately, and as the bonds would be drawn payable at par he would be sure of the cash within thirty-one years, which is the entire period requisite under the action of this accumulative sinking fund.

"But if he held twenty bonds of £100 each he might reasonably expect to have two of them drawn every three years on an average. The commercial world has now become so used to the action of these accumulative sinking funds, and to calculations dependent thereon for the profits arising from the difference between the par value of the drawn bonds and the price at which it is replaced in the market that we can and do estimate it in this instance at about one half per cent. per annum on the capital. If this be added to the interest it will make the total five per cent.

"As soon as it is notified to the holders that any of the present bonds are called in for redemption in greenbacks and that the coupons thereon would not be paid after a certain date, the holders would become very anxious and debate in their minds the propriety of sending their bonds to the United States to be cashed or of making an exchange in London, thereby saving all the commissions and other expenses.

"To show the effect of this proposition on a large scale, we will deal with having interests to the extent of $400,000,000 sterling, now carrying six per cent. interest, say $24,000,000. If nothing is done to alter matters, at the end of thirty-one years the debt will be the same, but if my plan be carried out it will be paid off altogether, both principal and interest.

"Each bond of $1,000 or £200 should give the owner the option of receiving the capital for his bond when drawn under the action of the sinking fund, either in America or in London, giving three months notice; and the same applies to the coupon, which should be either forty-five dollars or nine pounds sterling at the option of the holder, which is customary in the European loans."

To return once more to the point, let me inquire, Mr. President, why is this bond held by the bondholder in Europe or in the city of New York any more sacred than many other of the obligations of the United States? Here are the obligations to pay your soldiers, to pay your widows, those poor widows whose husbands have been sacrificed to save the country. You discharge your obligation to them in the paper currency of the country. Why? Because such is the law of the contract. Is that knavery? No, sir; no. It may be hard, but it is the law of the contract. Why do you pay the poor soldier who has come home from the battlefield maimed, with one arm or one limb, his pension in paper money and not in gold? Is there any contract more sacred? Are you repudiating because you pay him in paper money? No, sir; because it is the law of the contract; and if it be the law of the contract, as I maintain that it is, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance certainly maintains—and it was in the argument that I had with him him to-night, and in reply to him that I was making the observations which the Senator from Maine denounces as wanting in honor and as suggesting a species of knavery and dishonesty—if, I repeat, these five-twenties may be discharged in lawful money in the same paper money which was given in exchange for them, the paper money which now, as we offer it to them is worth almost double what it was when they let us have it, there is no knavery, no dishonesty in our offering to pay them in the lawful money of the country any more than there is in paying the widow her pension or the maimed soldier his pension in the same money.

Sir, I repudiate this whole idea that because a man is a money-lender a contract to pay him is any more sacred than to pay anybody else. I protest against it, I spit upon it, and, sir, (this charge hurled at me that I favor dishonesty, suggest knavery and dishonor, because I stand upon the contract, and stand upon the contract in favor of the rights of the great mass of the American people in letter and spirit, as well as stand upon the contract for the benefit of the bondholder. I will not repudiate the bondholder's just rights. I will not issue a flood of greenbacks, depreciate all values, bring bankruptcy and ruin and wreck upon the whole country for the purpose of making new greenbacks to discharge those debts. That would in my judgment be a violation of the spirit of the law under which they were issued, and under which the bonds were taken. But, sir, upon the law as it is, upon the greenbacks which have been issued under that law, the effect of which has been to depreciate the currency of the country and to make the word dollar in the contract which we made mean seventy-five cents in gold and not a hundred cents in gold, upon that law I stand, and I stand without dishonor. Let the Senator from Maine or any other Senator say what he will, I retort upon them and I charge home upon them that if they undertake to force a construction upon the law which it does not legitimately bear, if they undertake to add one fourth to the value of these five-twenties bonds against the true construction of the statute, they are the repudiators, they are the Shylocks, they are the men who advocate dishonesty, for there is nothing more dishonest than in the present condition of our country to increase in violation of law the burdens of an over-taxed and burdened people. Sir, the whole idea of repudiation, on the one side or the other, I reject and protest against; but in pleading and contending for the contract as it is, the contract as it was made, the contract as it was intended, and in the fulfillment of it which does ample justice to the bondholder, I am in the path of rectitude and the path of honor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I do not propose at this late hour of the night to go into the merits of the question now before the Senate, but I propose to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the spectacle presented here this evening in view of the remarks which have fallen from the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] and the Senators from Indiana and Ohio, [Mr. MORTON and Mr. SHERMAN.] What have we heard? What have we seen? Sir, if there are any two men in the United States who may be called representative men they are the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Ohio. One of them holds the high position of chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate; the other is acknowledged to be a leading member of the Republican party of the country. It is no disparagement to other Senators to say that those two Senators have no superiors in this body in talents, in influence, in character, in the estimation of the country. Now, what have we heard? The Senator from Ohio repeats what he has previously said; he repeats his deliberate opinion, as a question of law, that the five-twenties bonds are payable by the statute which created them in greenbacks, in paper currency. The Senator from Indiana declares the same opinion. He says he will not vote for this bill because it is against his convictions of the actual intention and meaning of the law; and he goes further and says that the sole object and the only effect of the bill is to benefit the bondholders and the speculators in bonds, without any advantage to the country. He agrees fully with the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE;] he quoted his argument; he cited his illustrations; he declared that, if this bill were to pass, there would be no possibility of funding the debt at a lower rate of interest until specie payments were restored. The honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Indiana have each of them a perfect right to their opinion. They are men capable of forming an opinion; and it is not my purpose this evening, although I differ from them somewhat, to dispute their opinions; I speak now for another purpose. These Senators having stated their opinions are responsible for the same, and I am sure they have no desire to shrink from the consequences. Whatever odium may attach to their opinions they are willing to incur.

But the Senator from Maine has seen fit, with his usual ability, to comment upon the debate which has taken place here to-day. He listened to what fell from the lips of the honorable Senator from Indiana and what was said by the honorable Senator from Ohio and also the speech of my friend from Wisconsin. He passed over what was said by those two Senators with approbation or with silence, yet he saw fit to comment with great severity upon the opinions of my friend from Wisconsin. Why was this? I am not here to impute any motives to that honorable Senator. He said that this was a new phase or a repetition of an old opinion of the Democratic party; that it was knavery, dishonesty, when it came from the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. I took occasion to ask him if it was not equally dishonesty and knavery when it fell from those two distinguished members of the Republican party, and he replied to me that those Senators took a different view of it; they had a different object and a different end from that of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin; that they desired to restore specie payments, and in that way that the bonds might be paid in specie. I replied to him that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin also desired to restore specie payments. He had said that it was his desire at the earliest possible day to restore specie payments. They stand upon precisely the same ground therefore in that regard, and in fact so far as I can see their views are practically identical. I am somewhat at loss therefore to understand why it is that what is knavery and dishonesty when avowed by one of these Senators loses this character and is pure, unsullied honesty and probity when announced by the others.

It is true—candor compels me to admit—that the honorable Senator from Ohio, as an act of generosity to the bondholders, says that now he is willing to pay them in gold, although he declares he does not think it our duty to do so; he does not think us bound in law to do so. If I agreed with him in regard to the question of law I certainly never should say I was willing to pass this bill. If I vote for it I shall not vote for it as an act of generosity. I do not propose to go to the bondholder and say to him, "I am not bound to pay you in gold; I have a perfect right to pay you in paper; but I propose to make you a present, a compliment, a gratuity of twenty-five per cent. upon your debt."

What right has the Senator from Ohio to make this gratuity to the bondholder? If there is anything which endangers the payment of the debt it is the doctrine taught by the Senators from Ohio and Indiana that it is not legally payable in specie; yet the Senator from Maine seems to think this a pardonable error, a venial offense only to be denounced when it comes from a Democrat, then it is knavery and dishonesty.

The honorable Senator from Indiana takes no such ground as that occupied by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] He declares that we are not bound to pay in gold; that we have a right to pay in paper, and therefore he sturdily, and I have no doubt honestly, refuses to vote for the bill, because he says it is not right; it is not the true meaning and intention of the law. He does not differ at all from the Senator from Wisconsin.

Now, sir, I desire the people of the country to understand that a large portion, a respectable portion, at least, in intellect and capacity, of the Republican party here declare this opinion. I might go further. I will not speak of members of the House of Representatives as such. I will allude to them as citizens of the United States. I desire to call the attention of the country to the opinions of two citizens of the United States of high position in the Republican party in talent, in character, in influence. One of them is no longer in the land of the living. Perhaps it is not proper to allude to him. I speak of a distinguished former member of the House of Representatives, now no longer living, highly respected by the Republican party of this country for the honesty of his opinions and the sincerity of his intentions—the late Thaddeus Stevens. What was his opinion on this subject? What did he believe with regard to it? What opinion did he pronounce to the people of this country? Every Senator knows very well what his opinion on this subject was, what his idea was with regard to the legal question whether the five-twenty bonds were payable in gold or payable in paper.

Permit me to call attention to the opinions of another distinguished citizen. I speak not of him as a member of the House of Representatives; I speak of him as a citizen of the United States; a leading member of the Republican party; a man of as much influence, of as much position, and of as much character in the estimation of that party as any citizen in this country. He has lately, in a position occupied by him, addressed the people of this country in his capacity as a member of the House of Representatives. He has put forth a plan for the payment of the debt. He has accompanied it by a speech; and it is utterly subversive of the idea of any payment other than in paper, either of the national debt or any other debt. It is repudiation in all its forms of every debt in this country, repudiation not only of gold and silver in payment of debts, but as a currency utterly throwing it out of view, in favor of abandoning the use of gold and silver as a currency, declaring it to be a relic of despotism, if not of barbarism. I am not at this moment animadverting on that opinion. But I desire the people of this country to understand that men holding the very highest position in the Republican party, standing in the front rank as Radicals, avow and advocate this doctrine that the debt of this country ought to be paid in paper. I have given these illustrations. And yet the honorable Senator from Maine thinks it his duty to say here to-night—I will not say for party purposes; no doubt for honest purposes; for I have not the least doubt he is sincere in his opinions—that this is exclusively a new phase, or a repetition of an old phase and doctrine of the Democratic party. Sir, the truth is that this idea of paying the Government debt in paper is a doctrine advocated by a very large portion of the Radical party. During the recent canvass and previous to it, especially in the western portion of the country, it was, as you well know, sir, in your own State and elsewhere in the West extremely popular. Democratic and Republican candidates for Congress placed before the people both advocated the doctrine; and it so happened in your own State that the man who advocated it with the most zeal and the most effect was the Radical candidate, and he was on that issue elected last winter to the House of Representatives.

But, sir, I will not at this time ask the attention of the Senate on this subject at any greater length. I wish it to be understood that here in this body leading and influential members of the Radical party have to-day announced the doctrine that the debt is properly and legally due and payable in paper currency. If that is a dishonest doctrine, if it is knavery, then it is knavery when it falls from the lips of a Radical, unless it be that there is something so pure and lofty and holy in Radicalism that it redeems the iniquity and the knavery and the dishonesty of this doctrine which seems so completely to shock my friend from Maine when it is avowed by a Democrat.

Why, sir, when he spoke of the views of the Senator from Ohio, I could not but be struck with the mildness, the softness, the sweetness of his temper, the smile that played on his features, as compared with the holy horror which filled his whole soul when he commented upon the remarks of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. He turned with the blandest and kindest smile to the Senator from Ohio and said it was true he had fallen into an error and entertained certain sentiments on this subject which did not entirely agree with his own opinions, but the Senator from Ohio favored this bill and therefore he was ready to pardon him. And then again his anger kindled against the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, and he went on to denounce the knavery and the villainy of the very same doctrine which, when held by the Senator from Ohio, was only a pardonable error and an innocent abstraction. That may be all consistent and right; I dare say it is; but it struck me as somewhat remarkable, and possibly in the partisan zeal of the Senator intended for partisan effect, and my object was to call the attention of the Senate to it as an instance of the effect of partisan zeal in warping the judgment of wise and candid men.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask my friend a question before he sits down. Does he agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Indiana in that construction of the law, that the debt is payable in greenbacks?

Mr. DIXON. I stated that I did not. If the Senator had been present this afternoon he would have heard me remark that I intended to vote for this bill, as I am happy to say all my colleagues in the other House voted, and as my colleague, I presume, in this body will also vote. Connecticut thus seems to be a unit on this question in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then, Mr. President, the object of the Senator, as I understand it, is to prove not that he approves of doctrines of that kind, but to prove that although he differs from the doctrines of his party he means to be found a very strong defender of them anyhow; that is, that he will hold fast to the Democratic faith in other things, although he cannot agree with them in this doctrine with regard to money. That, I suppose, is the object of his speech.

Now, let me say that I find no fault with gentlemen, whatever party they may belong to or whoever they may be, who believe that by the true construction of the law this debt may be payable in United States notes or greenbacks. That opinion they may entertain. What I complained of was the doctrine advanced by the Senator from Wisconsin, that we should make such use of it as to commit what I called a fraud upon the community who hold the paper. That idea was not advanced by the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Indiana; nor do I know that it was ever advanced by any gentleman holding the same political faith that they do. It was a speculative opinion upon the true construction of the statute as to what we might do. I do not know that either of them proposed to do it as the Senator from Wisconsin did. There was the distinction that I drew. If the Senator understands me now I suppose he will recognize that distinction.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will allow me a word—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to the Senator saying what he desires to say.

Mr. DIXON. It seems that the difference between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senators from Indiana and Ohio is this, according to the honorable Senator from Maine: the Senator from Wisconsin believes in a doctrine, and, as the Senator says, proposes to carry it out; and the other Senators believe in the doctrine and do not propose to carry it out. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I do not think it is. It may satisfy the Senator, however.

Mr. DIXON. Let us see whether they propose to carry it out or not. The Senator from Ohio announced the doctrine here a year ago, and introduced a bill in consequence of it and as a sequel to it proposing to compel the creditors of this country to accept bonds at a less rate of interest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; he did no such thing.

Mr. DIXON. The bill on its face did not propose to compel them; the bill did not say "if the creditors will not accept this they shall take something less;" but the bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio as the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the speech which he made in support and advocacy of it, taken together, were compulsory; for he declared in his speech that in his opinion the law authorized the payment of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks; and he introduced a bill with a view to carry out that idea, which reduced the rate of interest at least to five per cent., and I think to four and a half per cent. on the long bond.

Now, let us see whether the Senator from Indiana proposed to carry out his views. He believes in a doctrine which he does not intend to carry out in practice, it is said. What has he done? It is true he has not introduced a bill precisely of that character; but he declared this evening in as strong language as the honorable Senator from Wisconsin that he would not vote for this bill because he did not think it right; because it was a bill introduced for the purpose of benefiting the bondholders; and then he alluded, by way of illustration, to the very argument of the Senator from Wisconsin, to which the Senator from Maine objects, that if this bill were adopted and became a law it would be impossible for us to fund the greenbacks at a lower rate of interest; in other words, that you must hold out the idea that the bonds can be paid in paper in terrorem over the creditor, or otherwise you cannot fund your debt at a lower rate of interest. If that is not carrying out a principle into practice, I do not know what is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is rather a long interjection into the very few remarks I intended to make about this matter. As I said before, there is a very great difference between expressing the belief that by the terms of a law we may do a dishonest thing and actually proposing to do it; and that is the difference between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Wisconsin, according to my construction of their remarks.

Now, sir, I have only one word more to say, for I will not protract this debate. I admit that the honorable Senator from Ohio does hold that by the true construction of that law we might pay our debt in greenbacks. I admit that the honorable Senator from Indiana held the same doctrine as a question of law. I do not admit that the honorable member of the House from Pennsylvania did hold that doctrine; for he said expressly in the debate on the bill that the principal was payable in coin, and had I time I could turn to his remarks and show it. However we may respect the authority of those two gentlemen, and however high may be their standing, what I endeavored to say was, that because they believed so their belief did not make the faith of the Republican party or of the Congress of the United States. The Senator from Connecticut does not hold with his party upon that point as he expressly says.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to say—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not now. He expressly says he does not hold with his party.

Mr. DIXON. I have not said so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator proposes to vote for this bill. No other member of the party does propose to vote for it, and it has
